talks with Shamir airo official says dialogue will go on

By DAVID LANDAU
Diplomatic Correspondent

Officials had little of substance to report last night after a talk here with a senior Egyptian diplomat.

They said the visit of Shafi Hamid, an assistant secretary at the Foreign Ministry in Cairo, is significant in itself since it is the first time an Egyptian official of this rank has visited Israel in a year, and a half.

Hamid met with Prime Minister Yitzhak Shamir and with other Ministry officials. He told them only that "the dialogue will continue in order to achieve our goals."

He said the talks had been "d" and the Israeli officials, "id the atmosphere had been "ly and not acrimonious."

Israel's anger over the last week between President Mubarak and PLO chief Arafat in Cairo.

Hamid contended, according to Israeli sources, that the Arafat meeting had been to bring about a broadened peace process to include parties (he did not specifically name the PLO as a party).

Shamir repeatedly asserted far as Israel was concerned, and the PLO were not and not be partners in the peace process, directly or indirectly.

He urged Egypt to agree to a prompt resumption of the long-defunct Palestinian autonomy talks. They should be broadened, he said, to include Jordan and West Bank representatives as provided in the Camp David agreements.

Abdel-Hamid, for his part, made a point of stressing his government's commitment to Camp David and to the peace process with Israel.

Shamir argued that a thaw in the "cold peace" between Israel and Egypt would encourage other Arab states to join the peace process. Peace without normal relations was "not complete peace," the premier said. And the absence of the Egyptian ambassador for more than a year was "not normal."

In long working sessions at the Foreign Ministry, Director-General David Kimche and other aides went over Israel's list of grievances point by point. They cited the decline in trade, the dearth of Egyptian tourists and the non-existence of cultural ties as symptoms of the "freeze" in relations. Israeli sources said the Israeli side did most of the talking and Abdel-Hamid and his two aides most of the listening.

There were further talks over dinner in Tel Aviv last night.

The Egyptian group is to fly home this morning.

Treasury plan centres on 8% state budget cut

Post Economic Reporter

The economic framework package to be presented to the cabinet today by Finance Minister Yigal Cohen-Orgad is based on a cut of about 8 per cent in the government's civilian and military spending, government sources said yesterday.

There will be no change in income-tax rates, but levies on luxury goods, such as large cars, and some services may be imposed.

The source added that today's discussion will be only the first of several cabinet sessions on the subject. For now, only general principles will be discussed, with details slated to be worked out in separate talks between Treasury officials and the heads of the different ministries. The decision to avoid concrete decisions today follows yesterday's meeting of Herut Party ministers at which Prime Minister Yitzhak Shamir prevailed on Cohen-Orgad to postpone the final reckoning.

The 1984-85 budget under preparation is part of a long-term Finance Ministry plan, extending through 1987. It calls for a 7 per cent drop in the average standard of living in the coming year, followed by a freeze in 1985, with present levels restored only by the end of 1987. Real wages in 1984 will be 8 per cent lower on the average than in 1983, according to the plan.

The Treasury expects inflation to slow down after a period of continued acceleration, but it cannot yet say when this will occur. Predictions for price rises in 1984 are deliberately being kept vague.

The Treasury plans to cut a total of $1 billion from the state budget in 1984-85, following a similar cut in spending for the current fiscal year. (Continued on Page 13)

Cabinet crisis simmers; Orgad tables plan today

Jerusalem Post Staff

The coalition will not break up with a bang this morning when Finance Minister Yigal Cohen-Orgad gives the cabinet the outline of the 1984-85 budget. But it could conceivably disintegrate with a whimper over the next few weeks, when it translates the principles on which the budget is based into shekels and dollars.

Tension eased within the coalition last night despite the news-media frenzy, feeding on statements by faction leaders, which created the impression that Cohen-Orgad would come up against angry opposition this morning.

A senior coalition source told The Jerusalem Post last night: "We'll have a tranquil Shabbat because tomorrow we'll only discuss words. But from Sunday on, we'll be translating it (the proposal) into figures."

The source said: "The blanket is too skimpy to keep everybody in the coalition warm. So every faction will try to pull the blanket in its own direction, and some factions will be more muscular than others. But for the time being, all we know is that the Treasury wants to cut the budget by $1 billion."

Cohen-Orgad lobbied on behalf of his budget outline in tête-à-tête talks yesterday with Energy Minister Yitzhak Moda'i, Industry and Labour and Social Affairs Minister Aharon Uzan, Cohen-Orgad convinced all three that Prime Minister Yitzhak Shamir backs him to the hilt and that the Herut ministers are also solidly behind him.

Shamir convened the Herut ministers in his office last night to get them into line behind Cohen-Orgad. Only Minister-without-Portfolio Ariel Sharon was absent, as he has been from most cabinet sessions lately.

One Herut minister told The Post that the conclusion was devoted to Cohen-Orgad's exposition of his principles, followed by questions and answers. There was mention of a total $1b. cut, but specific ministry budgets did not come up.

This minister said that Cohen-Orgad's outline is not calculated to alarm the Tehiya party and provoke it into quitting the coalition. This, he said, is because funds for settlement in the administered areas are supplied by various ministries, which may weight their internal budget cuts to make sure that settlement suffers proportionately less than other spheres.

Defence Minister Moshe Arens reportedly asked more incisive questions than most of his colleagues.

Speaking later at an Advertisers Association meeting in Herzliya, Puri said that Cohen-Orgad's outline does not assure sufficient economic growth. Tourism Minister Avraham Sharir told the Liberal Party executive in Kfar Maccabiah that the public is nervous, so the government must set next year's budget without delay. Uzan told reporters after his meeting with Cohen-Orgad that he accepts the Treasury's principles, but that the cabinet will have to accept Tamir's principles whereby the strong must bear a heavier financial burden, while the weak might even need financial assistance.

A Labour Party statement yesterday rejected the idea of fees for high school and health care and warned that the government now has one last chance to avert economic catastrophe.

A top Tami leader warned last night that his party could not stay in the coalition if the serious dependent on welfare had their income eroded still further. He said that the way to an alliance with the Alignment lies open, and predicted that if Tami crosses the floor, the National Religious Party will also cross.

To prevent this disintegration, the Tami leader predicted, Cohen-Orgad will lower his sights considerably and settle on a budget cut of $500m, instead of $1b.

rael promised Arafat fe conduct—Mubarak

(AP). — Egyptian President Mubarak was quoted here on today as saying that he had a safe-conduct guarantee Israel for PLO chief Yasser Arafat and about 4,000 of his men when they were driven out of northern Lebanese city of last week.

In an interview with the Paris-Al-Wakef al-Arabi scheduled publication tomorrow, Mubarak said: "We have done everything to safeguard the safety of Arafat and contacted many parties obtained guarantees."

He said he obtained Israeli assurances, Mubarak said when to specify whether such parties included Israel.

He renewed his call on the Arabs to get differences and agree on a non approach to a Middle East settlement before U.S. President Reagan becomes preoccupied by next year's presidential elections.

"If 1984 passes without reaching agreement (among the Arabs) regarding the (Palestinian) issue, the problem will become exacerbated. The settlements will increase and we will find ourselves facing established facts," Mubarak warned.

Mubarak had high praise for Arafat, who he said emerged from the Tripoli crisis more powerful than before.

In another interview, published yesterday, with the editors of several Kuwaiti newspapers, Mubarak was quoted as saying he reached an "identity of views" with Arafat during their meeting last week, and that they had agreed to continue consultations to search for a Palestinian solution.

He did not go into details. Mubarak also vowed that Egypt (Continued on Page 13)

Israeli soldier wounded in Lebanon

Jerusalem Post Staff

A soldier was slightly wounded last night by small-arms fire directed at an Israeli Defence Forces position in Rashidiya south of Tyre.

Earlier in the day, two hand grenades were thrown at an IDF patrol in Nabatiya. A local woman was wounded, but there were no Israeli casualties. The IDF closed the region and conducted searches. During the past week, one Israeli soldier was killed and eight soldiers were wounded in attacks throughout southern Lebanon.

A senior officer in Lebanon told him yesterday: "After Operation Peace for Galilee (in summer 1982), we had quiet days in which we had a breathing spell and could think about tomorrow. But today it's really insane — there isn't a day that goes by without a terrorist attack, and we have to run around frantically after each incident. We have to find an end to this."

Jumblatt, Lebanese gov't envoys talk

Post Middle East Affairs Reporter and agencies

Druse leader Walid Jumblatt met in Amman yesterday with two Lebanese government emissaries in an apparent bid to prevent Lebanon from sliding further towards renewed civil war.

Jumblatt told the Associated Press after his meeting with Lebanon's ambassador to Switzerland, Johnny Abdo, and army intelligence chief Colonel Simon Kassis that "no political discussions took place." He insisted that their talks were restricted to the Saudi-mediated plan to disengage Lebanese combatants in Beirut's southern Shiite suburbs and in the Druse-controlled Shouf Mountains.

Despite Jumblatt's insistence that nothing "political" was discussed, yesterday's meeting does have undoubted political significance. It came just 24 hours after the Druse leader had raised the spectre of renewed civil war when he told a news conference in Damascus on Wednesday that reconciliation with the Jemayel administration in Beirut had become "impossible."

The fact that Lebanon's ambassador to Switzerland was present could also be of some significance. It raises the possibility that the three men discussed the resumption of the Lebanese national reconciliation talks suspended in Geneva six weeks ago.

Civil service workers keep up pressure

The ferment in the country's civil-service unions continued yesterday as workers at the Ministry of Labour and Social Affairs and the Interior Ministry maintained their sanctions, and vowed to carry on their protest actions until their demands are met.

In Tel Aviv the Clerks Union, one of the largest in the Histadrut, threatened sanctions in all municipalities and local authorities, unless negotiations over pay increases are begun immediately.

The country's 4,500 postal workers yesterday agreed to stay on the job and negotiate their wage demands with the Communications Ministry. The workers have threatened to resume sanctions or declare a general strike if a settlement is not reached within a week.

Defence Ministry employees are to begin protest action today, a court order restricting them having expired.

The staff of the Ministry of Labour and Social Affairs have turned down a request by the Knesset Labour and Social Affairs Committee to submit their demands to arbitration, and have vowed to intensify their actions on Sunday. Their sanctions have forced dozens of ministry institutions for children and the aged to close their doors this week.

The three major women's organizations — Na'amat, Emuna and Wizo — announced yesterday that they will close their day-care centres on Monday if they do not receive $150 million from the ministry on Sunday. The staff have not paid suppliers of ministry institutions, nor have they sent cheques to welfare organizations subsidized by the ministry such as the women's organizations' day-care centres.

The appeal to the staff to agree to arbitration was made yesterday at a session of the Knesset Labour and Social Affairs Committee by chairman Menahem Porush. The staff representatives explained that their demands to bring wages up to the level of salaries paid in other ministries were ignored for months, until they began their sanctions.

All 23 Interior Ministry offices throughout the country will be virtually closed to the public again today as angry workers continue their protest sanctions to press for higher job grades for more than half the ministry's 800 workers.

Staff-committee leaders from all units will meet this morning to decide on a course of action for next week.

Except for a few emergency cases, no passports or other official personal documents were issued yesterday, though all workers showed up at their desks. No outside telephone calls were answered. (Continued on Page 13)

ss says Assad had heart ailment

ASCUS (AP). — Syrian President Hafez Assad suffered a heart ailment brought on by exhaustion, not a heart attack, the official Syrian news agency said yesterday. He said Assad completely recovered.

Assad said in an interview with the Syrian Press that Assad had stricken November 13 with a heart ailment at the end of the arteries leading into the heart as a result of stress.

He gave no details, but a doctor asked not to be named said the ailment appeared from the description to be "a kind of angina pectoris," an ailment marked by sharp pains in the chest.

Tlass said Assad had been forced to take complete rest, but that no surgery or other medicine was needed.

Tlass said the official announcement of Assad's ailment was made because "there was a political problem at the time."

"We were expecting (Lebanese President Amin) Jemayel. There was no way possible to explain to the Lebanese the president was suffering from exhaustion in any way that would satisfy them," he said.

Argentina vows to probe fate of missing Jews

By DAVID LANDAU
Post Diplomatic Correspondent

Israel has received "unequivocal assurances" from the new government in Argentina that it will make every effort to establish the fates and find the burial places of Jewish desaparecidos, kidnapped and probably done to death during the years of military rule.

The assurances were given to David Kimche, director-general of the Foreign Ministry, who represented Israel at the inauguration of President Raoul Alfonsin earlier this month. Kimche raised the issue with the top echelon of the Foreign Ministry and with leading members of parliament.

A Knesset delegation, led by Alitya Committee Chairman Uzi Baram, is likely to visit Buenos Aires in January and it, too, will place the desaparecidos issue at the top of its agenda.

The Foreign Ministry here, which during the last months of the military regime reportedly urged the Knesset members to delay their mission, now seems warmly disposed to the visit.

In Buenos Aires, a prestigious commission appointed by Alfonsin has begun investigating the entire tragedy of the desaparecidos, whose number is variously estimated at 7,000, 15,000 and 30,000. A leading figure on the commission is Rabbi Marshall Meyer, an American-born Conservative rabbi who was active in opposition circles — to the chagrin of the Jewish community leadership — during the years of military rule.

In the Foreign Ministry here, officials have reacted bitterly to charges from some Argentinian olim groups that the ministry did little or nothing to help the desaparecidos over the years. Some (Continued on Page 3)

Meshel raps Orgad plan to cut wages

By JOSHUA BRILLIANT
Jerusalem Post Reporter

TEL AVIV. — Histadrut Secretary-General Yehoram Meshel yesterday warned the cabinet not to endorse the measures Finance Minister Yigal Cohen-Orgad is expected to propose today.

"It will not come to pass," he vowed to applauding Solel Boneh workers in Zichron Ya'acov. "The State of Israel and its economy will not be saved by reducing pay and hurting workers," he said, referring to the plan to cut wages by 12 per cent next year and to reduce private consumption by 8 to 10 per cent.

Meshel went on to strongly condemn the "trend to deepen unemployment and lead the country to a very dangerous recession."

Cohen-Orgad's statements and his "brazen disregard" for past agreements have already shaken the entire economy, Meshel continued. He recalled that contrary to recent undertakings by former Finance Ministry director-general Ezra Sadan on behalf of Cohen-Orgad, the government has not updated the value of income-tax credit points and children's allowances, so part of the recent cost-of-living advance will be absorbed by taxation.

Prime Minister Yitzhak Shamir's apparent backing of Cohen-Orgad's "faustian policy" is likely to make things worse, Meshel warned.

First such case for Israeli Arabs Jurists surprised by double death sentence

By DAVID RICHARDSON
Jerusalem Post Reporter

The unprecedented death sentence pronounced this week on two Israeli Arabs convicted of murdering a soldier has stunned the defendants' home communities and caused sharp debate among Israeli legal experts.

The two young members of the prominent Yunis clan in the twin villages of Ara and Arara in the Triangle north of Hadera are the first Israelis ever to be sentenced to death here.

Maher and Karim Yunis were found guilty by the Lod Military Court of the premeditated murder of Avraham Bromberg in November, 1980 and on Tuesday were sentenced to die by hanging.

The president of the court, Aluf-Mishne Aharon Alper, had ordered that the trial be conducted in camera and had stipulated that even the sentence was to remain secret. He was apparently overruled at the highest levels in the defence establishment.

The three judges — Alper, Sgan-Aluf Oded Modrik and Sgan-Aluf Bluer — handed down the death sentence even though the military prosecutor had not requested it.

The sentence, which radically departs from long-standing policy, and the attempt to keep it secret, have brought sharp criticism from some of the most senior judicial and legal figures in the country. The entire question is to be discussed between the justice ministry and the Israel Defence Forces judge-advocate-general.

Attorney-General Yitzhak Zamir said last night that when the question of the death penalty was raised in the past, it had always been discussed with him. He assumed that this had not occurred in this trial because the initiative to pass the sentence had not come from the IDF military prosecutor but from the judges themselves.

Since the creation of the state only three persons have been sentenced to death. Adolf Eichmann was hanged for war crimes, and one of the first Palestinian terrorists caught following the 1967 war, Ahmed Hijazi, had his death sentence commuted to life imprisonment; and in 1948 a Hagana officer, Meir Tobiansky, was shot as a spy after being convicted by a summary court martial.

The court found that the two men, both in their mid-twenties, had been recruited to join Fatah and ordered to kill a soldier. They picked up Bromberg on the night of November 26, 1980 as he was hitchhiking home to his family in nearby Zichron Ya'akov. Maher, who was sitting in the back seat of the car while Karim drove, shot the young corporal in the back of the neck with a pistol. They pushed him out of the car after stealing his automatic rifle.

The police detained both men in February last year.

Yesterday, the families of both young men alleged that their confessions had been extracted by torture.

Both villages, which straddle the main road between Hadera and Afula, were stunned and resentful yesterday following the publication of the sentences.

Karim's house, set back from a small agricultural track and surrounded by hothouses with a crop of winter cucumbers, was shuttered. Inside his family were clearly in mourning.

Almost all speak near-perfect Hebrew. His sister is studying at the nearby Pardess Hana high school, and while one of the largest pictures in the lounge is a popular Palestinian nationalist poster, all of the books on the shelf are Hebrew encyclopedias and novels.

Wherever one went in the two villages, people repeated that while they were outraged by the sentences they also denounced the murder.

"Even though we do not accept the sentence we condemn the murder, especially of a soldier by people from our village," said Mohammed Yunis, the chairman of the Ara local council. "All of us, especially the Yunis family, have constantly worked for coexistence."

Mahmoud Yunis, another clan member, said, "We live as a minority within a majority. This is a problem for both sides, but the Jews can always express themselves more freely. Whatever happens, I, my family and my society have to constantly prove our loyalty to the state."

Younger people in the villages had no doubt that similar sentences would not have been passed on Jews. But no one could explain what brought Maher and Karim to murder a soldier.

"In 1980 I worked daily with both of them at an agricultural machinery plant in Binyamina," said Ziad Yunis, 23. "We were close friends and if anyone should have known what they thought it should have been me. But it was never even discussed."

Lawyers representing the two men are to appeal against the decision and the sentence to the military appeals court. Even if this court upholds the sentence it still has to be confirmed by the chief of staff.

Legal circles and military sources could not explain why the judges departed from the long-standing policy on the death sentence and why they had tried to keep it secret.

An IDF spokesman said last night that since the entire proceedings and the sentence were declared secret he was legally forbidden to comment on or explain the court's decision.

The decision to place Israeli citizens on trial before a military court was also criticized by senior judicial circles. However, military and legal sources explained that this was common practice in cases involving terrorist activity, and that it had been recently upheld by the High Court of Justice.

Communications Minister Mordechai Zipori said yesterday that the sentence will be brought before the cabinet, and he will call for it to be implemented. He was speaking at the opening of a new telephone exchange at Moshava Kinneret.

El Al lost $123 million in 1982/83

Jerusalem Post Reporter

TEL AVIV. — El Al lost a record $123 million in the 1982/83 fiscal year, according to the balance sheet to be made public next Thursday.

A well-placed source told The Jerusalem Post that the company's operational loss totalled $45m. El Al lost $46m, more than it was gained as a result of a four-month strike over attempts to introduce drastic changes to improve finances. The remaining $32m, went on giving workers who quit the airline more than 100 per cent compensation, the source said. Some 1,000 employees left El Al during the year.

Senior sources maintained, however, that the outlook for the year ending March 31, 1984, is much brighter. An interim report shows an $8m, operational profit, which can be credited to last summer's tourism boom.

It is expected that there will, in fact, be an operational loss of between $15m and $25m for 1983/84. Part of that is reportedly the result of the cessation of Shabbat flights, although the airline has tried to cut losses by flying on Saturday nights.

The sources said the figures are better also because the airline has introduced the Boeing 767, which is cheaper to operate.

Electric Corp.'s Hofi to stay in post

By DAVID RUDGE
Jerusalem Post Reporter

HAIFA. — Yitzhak Hofi, general manager of the Israel Electric Corporation (IEC), told his board of directors yesterday that he will continue in his post.

The board appointed Amos Proshan as its chairman to succeed David Haguel, who resigned earlier this week following a bitter dispute with Energy Minister Yitzhak Moda'i.

The Jerusalem Post was told that Proshan intends to be an active chairman, like his predecessor.

Proshan and Hofi, who have occasionally clashed at board meetings, later issued a joint statement that they will strive to cooperate for the benefit of the corporation.

Hofi announced last week at the height of the confrontation between Moda'i and Haguel that he was considering resigning.

Moda'i had demanded Haguel's dismissal on the grounds that the former chairman had been instrumental in giving generous bonuses to IEC employees. These included increased car allowances for senior staff.

Sidon arrests prompt partial strike

By MENAHEM HOROWITZ
Jerusalem Post Reporter

METJULA. — The southern Lebanon city of Sidon was hit by a partial commercial strike yesterday following the arrest of 15 local residents, including two religious leaders.

Leaflets distributed in the city called on Sidonians to stop normal work, and last night emergency meetings were scheduled to discuss the arrests. During the day, Israeli officers told Sidon residents that anyone in the city, even religious leaders, will be arrested if they are found inciting hostile activity against the Israel Defence Forces.

Anti-coercion group decries tombstone removal

The Israeli Movement against Religious Coercion yesterday condemned the unknown persons who removed the tombstone from the grave of Tirza Engelowitz in the Rishon LeZion Jewish cemetery.

In a statement, the organization asserted that the act also desecrates the memory of large numbers of Jews murdered in the Nazi Holocaust but who, like Engelowitz, would not be recognized as Jews in modern Israel.

The movement has called a meeting for Saturday, January 14, in the Forest of the Six Million outside Jerusalem, to honour the memory of such people, including wives of Jewish men and their children, who were considered Jews by the Nuremberg laws and killed along with the rest of their families.

German charged with security offence

TEL AVIV (Itim). — The remand was extended yesterday of a West German, Ingo Mueller, 21, who is charged with intending to endanger the state's security and then to cross the border into Lebanon to join the PLO. The court is to decide whether to accept the prosecution request that he be kept in prison until the end of his trial.

During yesterday's hearing in the Tel Aviv District Court, the prosecution told Judge David Wallach that Mueller, formerly an East German, had been imprisoned in East Germany before being expelled led to West Germany in May 1983. He is charged with meeting two Lebanese in Amsterdam in October and agreeing to join the PLO in South Lebanon after an act of sabotage in Israel.

He arrived in this country in November and decided to destroy pumps in a police petrol station, but he was caught in the act because he made too much noise.

The prosecution told the court that the German Embassy refused to provide Mueller with an attorney. Judge Wallach ordered that he be given a German-speaking lawyer.

'Unbalanced press reports' led Frenchman to spy for Fatah

TEL AVIV (Itim). — A French citizen accused of spying for Fatah began testifying in his own defence in district court here yesterday, saying that he was misled into an "unbalanced" view of the Arab-Israeli conflict by one-sided reports in French newspapers.

Henri Eicholtz, 26, was arrested on arrival in Israel for what he said was an innocent visit. But five years ago, he admitted, on an earlier visit, he took pictures of the Shalom Tower and Carmel Market area in Tel Aviv. In a written deposition a few months ago, he denied knowing of plans to carry out terror attacks in the region, which, according to the charges, his photographs were meant to facilitate.

In his statement to the police, Eicholtz related how he became friendly with a man named Shafik in Libya five years ago. He later travelled to Lebanon to teach French in refugee camps, and while there received training in handling explosives. The Greek ship on which he sailed to Beirut, he said, carried arms for the PLO, but was permitted to sail after being intercepted by an Israeli Navy boat when the captain said it held only civilians.

In France, the defendant obtained a new passport, without visas from the Arab countries he had visited, and put Shafik's picture on another passport belonging to someone else. The pair came to Israel, and Eicholtz stayed for a month, while Shafik sneaked across the border to Lebanon.

The Frenchman admitted receiving $1,000 from the PLO for his expenses, but on the witness stand said he had come out of "a certain sympathy for the Palestinians." The feelings, he explained, were engendered by reporting he had read in Le Monde and Liberation, but he has since come to accept a more balanced view and regrets his actions.

Defence attorney Roland Roth argued that the photographs taken by Eicholtz showed nothing more than what can readily be seen on common picture postcards, and that he had not entered any forbidden zones.

The defendant had difficulty standing, because of injuries suffered recently in a fire in his prison cell. European diplomats have reportedly inquired into the circumstances of the fire to find out whether it might have been an intentional attempt to eliminate him.

Ha'aretz Museum 'building structures without permits

By MICHAEL YUDELMAN
Jerusalem Post Reporter

TEL AVIV. — Large-scale construction work is going on at the municipal Ha'aretz Museum without building permits, senior City Hall sources charge. Municipal engineer Shmuel Penn said: "If this is so, legal action will be taken."

A senior source in Penn's department said the plans for various additions to the museum have not yet referred to the district planning and building committee. This body is the only one competent to issue a building permit.

Mayor Shlomo Lahat said he did not know that illegal building was going on at the museum, nor did he know what was being built there.

Other senior officials also admitted yesterday that they had no idea what is being built at the museum. City Hall has poured more than $600 million into the museum, the mayor appointed Re Zeevi museum curator.

The buildings being constructed consist of an entrance which includes a bookshop, cafeteria; an amphitheatre; restrooms and services pavilions for "handicraft" "Epochs of Eretz Yisrael," storey structure for security and a restaurant.

The "Handicraft" pavilion, the restrooms are almost complete and the others are in various stages of construction.

Examination of the files that some of the building plan approved by the local planning building committees, which mended passing them on approval by the district body single permit for any structure files.

Rabin: Budget cuts can come only out of defence

Jerusalem Post Reporter

TEL AVIV. — The defence budget must be trimmed, Knesset Member Yitzhak Rabin (Alignment-Labour) told a meeting of the Israel-America Chamber of Commerce yesterday. "There can be no significant cut in the state budget unless the sum allotted to defence is reduced," he said.

Explaining, Rabin said that one third of the budget goes to repaying debts, another third goes to defence and the remainder to everything else.

Rabin recalled that during the 1966 recession, when he was chief-of-staff, the then-prime minister

Levi Eshkol wanted his cut from 90 to 70 the Mirage jet fighters order France.

Rabin said he reluctantly But Israel did well in the War without them, he said. After the speech, the chafed Rabin a medalion, interrupted the presentation, that in a similar instance once been given a Jab medalion, but his own party hounded him for a that issue. He then pulled out of his jacket pocket, the inscription — and acceptance gift. (Rabin on Lebanon —

Woman admits strangling 5-year-old

By MICHAEL YUDELMAN

TEL AVIV. — Mira Yarogan, 32, of Kiryat Ata, was remanded into custody for 15 days by the magistrates court yesterday after confessing to the murder of her five-year-old son.

She admitted strangling the boy to death before dawn yesterday at the Yarkon police station, where the two were spending the night. She told police she had strangled her son "to relieve him of his suffering."

At about 1:30 a.m. yesterday, a police patrol saw a woman and a little boy, wandering in Yitzhak Sade Street. The woman told the police that she had been visiting her boyfriend in Kfar Yona prison, near Netanya, and had nowhere to spend the night.

Taking pity on the woman and child, the police took them to the Yarkon Division headquarters and gave them a room with beds and blankets for the night.

At about 3 a.m. the woman came out of the room with the boy and told the policeman on duty that she was going to the toilet. A few minutes later she came in and told the policeman she had strangled her son, to put him to rest.

The policeman called officers in the station and told the boy's dead body in the Police said yesterday Yarogan had been living Arab until he was imprisoned that she said she was under a considerable mental stress.

Herzog condemns violence, intolerance

HAIM SHAPIRO
Jerusalem Post Reporter

For spiritual leaders to exert their moral authority and influence against violence and crime from President Chaim Herzog during his reception for the Christian communities taking at the annual event held at Hanassi to mark the secular year, the president referred to unidentified person who left a booby-trapped grenades at a Jerusalem institution and several times this month.

Recently, we have been witness of intolerance by individuals have no place in our society, which we condemn with all the at our disposal," he said.

Responding, Greek Orthodox archbishop Diodoros I, by tradition senior Christian cleric in Jerusalem, also spoke of violence and terrorism "often directed against innocent people, and even against religious institutions and places of worship and those who serve in them.

"Holy places and religious institutions, as well as those who serve and worship in them, must remain always a focus of respect and a source of inspiration, free from any and all political involvement," the patriarch's statement said. Such acts of terror, he declared, should be condemned, whatever the faith or nationality of the perpetrators.

On the same theme, Interior and Religious Affairs Minister Yosef Burg pledged to do his utmost "to ensure the safety of every creed and every individual." Burg also noted that on such an occasion, one is particularly aware that in a real democracy, one does not just do the will of the majority, but also listens to the minority.

Police intensify search for 2 escaped rapists

Police and Border Police searching throughout the country yesterday for two rapists on the run from Ramle prison, said, ports and beaches were closed and every police force in the country was put on the alert as to find the two — Shlomo Shah and Salim al-Abed — intensified.

Rapists have been on the run since Wednesday. Halawah, serving a 22-year sentence for five rapes and an attempted murder, absconded from a group of fellow inmates during a tour of Haifa and Carmel.

Al-Abed, serving a nine-and-a-half-year prison term for rape and related crimes, was discovered during the 10 p.m. roll call at Ramle jail on Wednesday.

Halawah had been permitted to leave the tour as he had been given leave on previous occasions, was discovered missing when 15 prisoners and their guards returned to their bus after a short tour near Hadera.

Police sources told The Jerusalem Post that it was not yet known when he had escaped during this or earlier in the tour.

Al-Abed's escape was discovered during a thorough search of al-Abed's block was conducted. No sign of the missing man was found.

Former French president Valery Giscard d'Estaing lays a wreath yesterday on a memorial to French Jews killed by the Nazis.

Giscard 'very moved' by Yad Vashem

Former French president Valery Giscard d'Estaing said yesterday his visit to Yad Vashem had made a "very deep and moving impression" on him.

Giscard, who arrived Wednesday on a private visit that is to include talks with Israeli leaders, was received by the Yad Vashem Memorial Authority's director, Dr. Yitzhak Arad, and took part in a wreath-laying ceremony in the Hall of Remembrance. The former French president said that a people that has survived such vicissitudes as the Jewish people has done will surely go on living long.

He displayed a great deal of interest in the museum's section dealing with the Jewish fighters in the French underground. He presented to the Yad Vashem archives a copy of a speech he gave at the Birkenau concentration camp in Austria in 1975.

The former French president, who never visited Israel during his seven years in office, told reporters he would return on another occasion.

Earlier, Giscard laid a wreath at the monument to 80,000 French Jews murdered by the Germans and their collaborators during World War II near Moshav Rogit in the Jerusalem Corridor.

After planting a pine sapling in the Jewish National Fund Forest next to the monument, he said to an official: "Please watch over my tree. When I return I would like to see how it is growing."

He was to tour Bethlehem with Mayor Elias Freij later in the day.

Kibbutz regains good name after 35 years

NITZANIM (Itim). — The stain Kibbutz Nitzanim in the south bore for having surrendered to the Egyptians during the War of Independence was finally removed Wednesday night.

In the course of the invasion of the newborn state of Israel by the armies of five Arab states, an Egyptian armoured force pushed northward in the direction of Tel Aviv. The invaders overran Kibbutz Yad Mordechai and on June 11 Kibbutz Nitzanim surrendered, and some of its members and fighters of the Givati Brigade were taken prisoner.

After this defeat, brigade headquarters issued a "Battle Page," entitled "The fall of Nitzanim — a failure." It was written by the brigade's cultural officer, author Abba Kovner.

Efforts of the kibbutz and of the Ha'oved Hatzioni movement to which it belonged, to get the Israel Defence Forces to erase this blot on the settlement were fruitless.

The entire matter surfaced again two weeks ago, when Shimon Avidan, who was Givati Brigade commander and sometime member of Nitzanim, appeared on a television programme, "In the footsteps of fighters of '48," and said he would not retract what had been written in the "Battle Page."

Since the broadcast, past and present members of Nitzanim renewed their efforts to clear the kibbutz's good name. As a result, a meeting was arranged between Avidan and the kibbutz on Wednesday night. In addition to Avidan's saying television had distorted his comments, he told kibbutz members that if he were to issue such a "Battle Page" today, he would entitle it "The fall of Nitzanim — the failure of the brigade."

Avidan also apologized to the kibbutz and the fighters for having made this correction so late. He also said that he had no explanation for not having visited the settlement since 1948, adding that his absence had no significance.

Nitzanim's secretary, Arye Edelheit, told Jim after the meeting that the IDF has in fact published documents that describe the settlement's resistance to the Egyptians as "harvery" and remove all guilt from it. But these documents are not widely known.

The IDF chief education officer, who arranged the meeting, promised the kibbutz that an effort will be made to have textbooks on the War of Independence describe the Nitzanim battle in its proper light.

Man held in death of his elderly parents

GAZA (Itim). — A man has been arrested here on suspicion of killing his 90-year-old father and 70-year-old mother.

The police said that on Wednesday afternoon, a Gaza resident told them that she had not seen her parents for a week. Her report aroused suspicion about her 41-year-old brother.

Police went to his house and found fresh signs of digging in the yard. Investigators dug at the site and found the two bodies, which were taken to the Institute of Forensic Medicine at Abu Kabir.

MISSING ARGENTINE JEWS

Of these charges link Israel's alleged inaction to its long-standing arms-sales relationship with Buenos Aires.

Angrily rebutting this claim, a high official noted that Prime Minister (then only foreign minister) Yitzhak Shamir made a high-profile démarche on behalf of desaparecidos and their families in December 1982, when the arms-sales business was burgeoning.

Shamir in fact made his visit then to Argentina conditional upon his being able to raise the desaparecidos issue at the highest level. This was a precedent — for a foreign statesman to intercede on behalf of individual Argentine citizens.

He submitted a list of 341 names, supplied by Jewish families in Israel and abroad. In addition, he handed over a list of 28 detainees known to be held in specific prisons.

All of the 28 were released within eight months. As for the 341 desaparecidos, the Argentine authorities contended in subsequent diplomatic contacts that records showed that 32 of them had left the country. They provided specific dates and specific destinations.

None of the families of the 32 had heard anything to confirm that they were safely out of Argentina. But the Argentine authorities had an answer to this: the 32 were "auto-desaparecidos." In other words, they were deliberately pretending to be disappeared-presumed-dead in order to further embarrass the Argentinian government.

The Argentinian ambassador in Tel Aviv argued that Israel should accept Buenos Aires' version of the 32 because if Argentina had sought to lie, it would have lied about a larger number of the 341 on Shamir's list.

Regarding the other 309, Argentina gave Israel no information at all.

Why was there no such high-level, high-profile Israeli intercession earlier? (Most of the kidnappings took place in the late 1970s.)

According to Menahem Karmi, head of the South America division at the Foreign Ministry, Israel was always eager to help "whenever an approach was made to us." The Israeli embassy informed the DAIA, the roof-body of Argentine Jewry, that Israel stood ready to help in whatever way it could. "We could only address ourselves to the organized community," Karmi said.

But in the early years Israel received few approaches for help. Families believed and hoped their relatives would return. Many felt that to involve Israel would be to court further danger.

Indeed, there are families of desaparecidos living in Israel who to the present day have declined to turn to the Israeli government for help for fear that this could cause harm to other family members still in Argentina.

Now, with the return of democratic rule, Luis Haimowitz, moving spirit among the desaparecidos families in Israel, has placed advertisements in the local Spanish-language press urging these families to come forward with detailed information about their kidnapped relatives.

Haimowitz's own daughter, Alejandra, was kidnapped more than five years ago.

Given the reluctance on the part of some families to come forward — there are many more such families in Argentina — Israeli officials readily admit that Shamir's list of 341 was only partial, and that the true figure of Jewish desaparecidos is probably much higher. (Independent sources put it at 1,500.)

These officials support the view of most establishment Jewish leaders in Argentina — that the Jews were not kidnapped as Jews, but rather because their politics offended one or another of the gangs of thugs in the service of the various military warlords. Once incarcerated, however, many of them no doubt suffered added torture and affliction because of their Jewishness.

The most famous example of this pattern was Jacobo Timerman, the prominent newspaper editor who was imprisoned soon after the military took power. The officials noted that Israel, especially the late ambassador Ram Niv, was deeply and persistently involved in the efforts that eventually brought about Timerman's release. (He subsequently came to Israel but reportedly now intends to return to Argentina.)

The officials say that looking back now they still believe that drastic diplomatic action by Israel as advocated by some of the families — recalling the ambassador or even severing relations — would have made no practical contribution towards rescuing the desaparecidos.

U.S. battleship crew on Haifa shore leave

HAIFA. — The 45,000-ton American battleship USS New Jersey, currently operating off the coast of Lebanon, arrived here yesterday morning for a visit of a few days.

Its stay in Haifa will enable the crew of 1,500 to get shore leave after weeks of continuous service at sea since being ordered to Lebanon by U.S. President Ronald Reagan to back up the U.S. Marines in Beirut.

Its service has included shelling shore positions with its 406-millimetre guns.

The New Jersey, the only World War II battleship still in service, has been twice renovated and spent years in mothballs before being recommissioned. It has a wide range of guns giving it impressive fire power.

IN A RECENT article which, because of its apparent timeliness, made its way into the editorial pages of The New York Times, Knesset member Amnon Rubinstein called for an end to all the "foolish 1984-ing" going on these days. "Orwell's inverted Utopia," wrote Rubinstein, "half a warning and half an exercise in desperate futurology, has failed to materialize." Following a cursory outline of current world affairs, Rubinstein dismissed the import of George Orwell's book out of hand, concluding that, "1984 is blissfully becoming less and less relevant."

Despite his renowned intellectual prowess, Rubinstein, in the case of 1984, has missed the point entirely. Or, rather, several points. His terminology is wrong, his reading of the novel wrong, and his grasp of the cultural significance of the very term "1984" is misguided.

In the first place, 1984 belongs to that class of fiction known as "dystopian." The word is an antonym of "utopia," and is commonly used to denote a class of model societies which are, as opposed to Utopian designs, images of a fearful and unpleasant world.

Dystopian novels are generally used as a standard of comparison, as admonitory or satirical works against which the real world can be measured. Indeed, except as satires, there are very few dystopian, or "worst-case" fictions in existence. For while there is always a motive for imagining a better place elsewhere on earth, it is pointless to imagine, within the context of literature, a worse place. Such places have always existed in abundance in the real world. In literature, we have had euhorion (better-time) novels and stories, but, especially within the context of science fiction, these have seldom been intended as propaganda for a change of attitude in the present.

Dystopian works, then — and we include among them such novels as Huxley's Brave New World, Golding's Lord of the Flies, Burgess's Clockwork Orange, Vonnegut's Player Piano — comment on the present-day world. They are not intended as "futurollogical" in any sense at all.

ORWELL'S WORK provides an excellent example. There is almost nothing "new" in the book. It is, to use Anthony Burgess's definition, a "comic transcription of London during the years immediately following WWII." Indeed, Orwell (a pen name for Eric Blair) wanted to call the book 1948, but his publishers wouldn't allow it.

The book was not terribly new, because most of what Orwell had to say was inspired by a book called We, which was published in Russian outside the Soviet Union by the exiled writer Yevgeny Zamyatin. Indeed, Orwell reviewed the book for the London leftist weekly, Tribune.

It is, in many ways, a better book than 1984, extrapolating the repressive potentials of the centralized state guided by rational utilitarianism, in which the only irrational element is the people. People in We do not have names, only numbers. They live in glass houses, as television would not achieve any vogue until the Thirties, and Orwell's "telescreen" is simply an improvement in police methods. The language in the book, like the "newspeak" of 1984, is expressionistic, manipulated for speed and economy. There are no neurologists working on the elimination of the orgasm, as in Orwell's dystopia, but sex is rationed, available for coupons.

DISPENSING with the sadism and tragedy of 1984, two elements coloured by the fact that Orwell wrote it when he was dying, trying desperately to make enough money to leave to his family, the book is really about 1948.

It is often strange to hear young people use the term "1984" to describe what they perceive to be a form of repression. I once heard it used to characterize the airport in Atlanta, Georgia — a gleaming white affair, cold and aseptic, computerized and impersonal.

This is not the world of 1984. Orwell's world is run down and seedy, rampant with the smells of working-class kitchens, fish and chips, and boiling cabbage. It is a world of shoddy food, rough clothes, and coarse soap. It is a world of ruined buildings, electricity blackouts (though, strangely, the telescreen never gives out), and glowing crater.

Call it the aftermath of WWII, though Orwell only had Hiroshima as an example, which was bad enough, with the world still fighting it out conventionally, after a thugs' agreement had been reached by the three major powers to stay away from "nukes."

But it was really 1948, with last year's ally, "Uncle Joe" Stalin, this year's target for manipulated hate, and the world re-aligning itself in accord with a balance of terror. Mao Tse-tung would actualize the third power concentration, "Eastasia," in a year's time, but Chiang Kai-shek was clearly on the retreat for any but Time magazine writers and readers.

In Britain, there was still rationing and privation. The danger and risk, the sense of community of WWII, were things of the past, but otherwise it was almost as if the war was still going on, no respite in sight for those who, after as long as six years in uniform, yearned for the better times they thought they had fought for. It was an English socialist Britain, in which Utopian hopes of the working classes were being tempered by a kind of latter-day Calvinism. Hence, Orwell's rather funny "Anti-Sex League," and the fear of subversive pleasure, the embrace of pain as a value.

LOOKING CLOSER at some of Orwell's props, we see more of the times he was dying in. By giving his protagonist the name Winston Smith, he was bringing Churchill, who had never been terribly popular with the working classes, down to the most proletarian level.

Try "Big Brother," that fictional leader who, because he was never born, was immortal. The Bennett Correspondence School of London advertised in 1948 via posters showing the affable Bennett pleading, "Let me be your father." Later, his poster switched to "Let me be your big brother."

"The Three Minute Hate"? Orwell had served in the army. He recalled the weekly indoctrination session held by education officers and sergeants, who would lecture the recruits on the need to despise the Huns.

The "Ministry of Truth"? Orwell served during the war as a BBC broadcaster, plying the Indian airwaves with wartime propaganda. The ministry was really Broadcasting House. Orwell's office had been in the basement, Room 101, actually.

AH YES, you ask, but what about the politics of the book? Sorry, nothing new there either. Orwell was simply saying something Milton had said to Cromwell's England, "Hang on to your liberties!" A message, which, to get back to Mr. Rubinstein, seems to have become irrelevant.

Well, there was more. The book would not have won such a central place in popular western culture without a new angle. And 1984 does possess two cardinal virtues, one rational, the other emotional. Combined, they mark a significant contribution to modern political thought.

The former is Orwell's belief that the purpose of power is power. "If you want a picture of the future," he wrote, "imagine a boot stamping on the face of humanity... for ever." Those who are down, he said in this, the book's most chilling line, are kept down.

The book's emotional virtue is that its Utopian desires seem far more human than those posited by Plato, More, and H.G. Wells. The "good life" for Orwell can be measured by something good to eat, no intruding neighbours, a few amenities, and a girl to bed on occasion.

Combined, these two ideas give way to a third, that power obliterates character. "What have you done with Julia?" said Winston. "You tortured her?" "Next question," he said. "Does Big Brother exist?" "Of course he exists. The Party exists. Big Brother is the embodiment of the Party." "Does he exist in the same way I exist?" "You do not exist," said O'Brien.

NOW, this "warning" business Mr. Rubinstein mentions.

I don't think the book was ever intended as such. Satires do not deal with warnings, they deal with present-day evils. The darkness and despair of the book, as I have mentioned, resulted from Orwell's terminal illness, which in turn inspired a "terminal vision." Nevertheless, 1984 has been perceived as a warning, and it has served as one.

It has done so successfully. We in the West have not fallen under the iron thumb of Big Brother, and this is perhaps partially because 1984 helped sensitize people to the dangers. Thus, it has made the prospect of such a dystopia evolving less likely.

Many of the dystopian visions of popular culture have been outdated in terms of dates. Neville Shute's On The Beach postulated the outbreak of WWII in 1962. Dido Kubrick's Doctor Strangelove, Golding's Lord of the Flies, and Burgess's Clockwork Orange, which, if it has not yet been pre-empted by a year, will be so soon. Surely the warnings inherent in these novels remain valid nonetheless. They still frighten.

We have indeed reached the brink of 1984 without it consuming us. Whether we succeed in holding the threat of it at arm's length, however, may depend in part on how indelibly that date has been etched into our minds.

EIGHTY-THREE WAS BAD ENOUGH

By IRENA CZEKIERFKA

WORSENING East-West relations and conflicts in the Middle East and Central America raised international tension in 1983, a year in which the superpowers stopped talking about nuclear arms reductions.

United States medium-range nuclear weapons began arriving in Western Europe and talks between the Soviet Union and the U.S. aimed at cutting their arsenals broke off with no dates set for their resumption.

As the year closes, at least five areas are still being torn by constant fighting: Lebanon, the Gulf, Afghanistan, Central America and Kampuchea. In Chad, a 17-year conflict flared anew.

Three dramatic events captured international attention: The Soviet shooting down of a South Korean airliner with 269 people on board; the American-led invasion of Grenada, and suicide car bomb attacks on peacekeeping troops in Lebanon.

Hardly a day passed without word of the crisis in Lebanon, of internal fighting among Palestinian and religious factions, and of tentative cease-fires frequently broken.

TWO YEARS of U.S.-Soviet talks in Geneva on limiting intermediate-range nuclear forces (INF) in Europe ended in November when the Soviet Union walked out after the West German parliament voted to go ahead with deployment of U.S. Pershing-2 missiles under a 1979 NATO plan.

Despite massive demonstrations from anti-nuclear protesters, all over Europe, the first Pershing-2 and Cruise missiles due for deployment began to arrive in Britain, West Germany and Italy in November.

Separate U.S.-Soviet talks on long-range intercontinental missiles and NATO-Warsaw Pact discussions on conventional weapons in Europe have also adjourned, without resumption dates.

In Lebanon, PLO loyalists and PLO leader Yasser Arafat finally left Tripoli after weeks of fierce battles against Syrian-backed rebels.

ATTACKS ON international peace-keeping forces in October, claiming the lives of 241 U.S. and 38 French troops, and the later ear-bombing of an Israeli base in South Lebanon, will be remembered among the horrifying events in Lebanon this year.

The suicidal bombings took place in Beirut and later against French and U.S. targets in Kuwait.

The Lebanese crisis also brought Syria into confrontation with the U.S. and, to a lesser extent, French forces based in Beirut.

In the Gulf War, Iran launched several offensives against Iraq during the year, and in response to Iraqi threats of attacks on oil installations in the Gulf, said it would block the Straits of Hormuz, if disruption of its oil shipments continued.

THE INVASION of Grenada, a former British colony, followed a power struggle in the ruling Marxist party and a military coup during which Prime Minister Maurice Bishop was killed.

Grenada's close ties with Cuba and the Soviet Union had soured relations with the U.S., which maintained that a new airport being built on the island was to be used as a launching pad for Cuban operations in Africa and South America.

Washington came in for mixed reactions over its intervention in Grenada and critics also attacked its policy of financing a rebel war against the Sandinista government in Nicaragua, and backing the El Salvador army against rebels.

Deteriorating relations between the two superpowers formed a continuous strand through 1983, flaring with the destruction in September by Soviet pilots of a South Korean airliner carrying 269 passengers.

The Soviet Union maintained that the plane was on a spying mission over secret military installations near the island of Sakhalin, and ordered it be shot down after it apparently failed to respond to warnings.

In Western Europe, support for the NATO alliance and nuclear deployment seemed to be indicated by the election of the right wing Christian Democratic Union in West Germany and the return to power in Britain of Margaret Thatcher's Conservative Party.

Municipal elections in France also reflected a swing to the right, with the socialists and communists losing control of 41 major towns and gaining only one.

The left fared better in Australia where, under the new leadership of Bob Hawke, the Labour Party swept to victory in general elections in March.

DEMOCRACY RETURNED to two countries — Argentina and Turkey — after years of military rule.

In Argentina, Raul Alfonsio was sworn in as president in December after leading his reformist Radical Party to a landslide victory in elections.

And in Turkey, an elected assembly met for the first time since the 1980 military coup, with Turgut Ozal, leader of the conservative Motherland Party which won the November elections, taking office as prime minister.

Cyprus became the focus of international attention when Turkish Cypriots in the north proclaimed an "independent Turkish Republic of Northern Cyprus," but only Turkey has so far recognized the unilateral declaration.

In the Philippines, opposition leader Benigno Aquino was shot dead as he returned from exile in America. The assassination led to huge public demonstrations against President Ferdinand Marcos's government.

And in Burma, two North Koreans were sentenced to death for their part in an October bomb explosion which killed 21 people, including four visiting South Korean cabinet ministers.

THE YEAR brought mixed fortunes for the Poles. Martial law was officially lifted and a limited amnesty declared for political and other offenders in July, but strict controls on social and economic life continued.

Pope John Paul II paid his first visit as Pope to his native country in June and met Polish leader General Jaruzelski and Lech Walesa, leader of the banned free trade union Solidarity.

Demonstrations marking the third anniversary of Solidarity in August were broken up by riot police, but in October came the news that Walesa had been awarded the Nobel Peace Prize.

PRESIDENT REAGAN's welcoming of the meeting between Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak and PLO chairman Yasser Arafat was but the latest example of an increasingly frustrated administration's grasping for straws in an effort to salvage its Middle East policy.

The decision, which seriously upset officials in Jerusalem, as well as their supporters in the U.S. Jewish community, also reflected the seemingly endless contradictions generated by that policy.

Thus, on December 27, Reagan appealed to all "civilized nations" to band together in the fight against "state-supported terrorism." He said: "We have never before faced a situation in which others routinely sponsor and facilitate acts of violence against us, while hiding behind proxies and surrogates which they claim they do not fully control."

Those countries "which sponsor terrorism and terrorist activity around the world," Reagan said, without mentioning any names, must be held "accountable."

Reagan's aides later said he was referring to Syria and Iran — the two countries which U.S. intelligence officials believe were responsible for assisting Lebanese Shi'ite extremists in bombing Marine headquarters in Beirut last October.

In his statement, Reagan offered some examples of "state-supported" acts of terror. He mentioned the bombings at U.S. facilities in Lebanon and Kuwait, as well as other recent attacks, including "the terrorist bombing in Rangoon, the senseless murder of Turkish diplomats, the attack on the Pope, the bombing of our own capital and on the streets of London."

Israeli officials could not help but notice that there was no reference to recent attacks against Israeli institutions, such as the Jerusalem bus bombing for which both wings of the PLO quickly claimed responsibility.

Israeli officials were scratching their heads, wondering why Reagan could not have mentioned any of the attacks against Israel, which, after all, has probably been the major victim of state-supported terrorism over the years. But to have done so would have upset the Arabs.

It's also important to recall that while even a weakened Arafat may still be regarded as one of the world's most criminal terrorists by Israeli officials in Jerusalem, he is not viewed as such by several key administration officials in Washington. They believe Arafat still is the most popular Palestinian leader on the West Bank and that only he can give the necessary green light to Jordan's King Hussein to join the peace process.

THAT WAS WHY Reagan not only welcomed Arafat's last-minute, internationally organized and UN-sanctioned rescue operation in Tripoli, and his subsequent hero's welcome in Cairo, but actually was very active behind the scenes in promoting both developments.

Secretary of State George Shultz, almost obsessed by the Palestinian question despite his recent readiness to expand strategic ties with Israel, and National Security Adviser Robert McFarlane, heavily influenced by the Saudi ambassador in Washington, 34-year-old Prince Bandar, both remain very determined to get Reagan's ill-fated Arab-Israeli peace initiative of September 1, 1982 off the ground.

Reagan has been deeply embarrassed by the moribund state of that proposal. His top aides, responsible for pushing him into personally releasing it, are understandably still very anxious to rescue it, especially as Reagan gears up for re-election. Foreign policy has not exactly been a strong point in his first term. With the Lebanese situation becoming increasingly more messy, Reagan and his advisers are willing to do almost anything to score a foreign policy triumph.

Winning an Egyptian-PLO rapprochement, U.S. officials said, was the first step in that direction. They now hope Arafat and Hussein can resume their talks aimed at permitting the Jordanian monarch to represent Palestinians in peace talks with Israel. Such an effort collapsed last April when Arafat could not gain enough backing from his PLO leadership. At that time, the U.S. was very disappointed since the entire Reagan scheme was based on the assumption that Hussein would get involved. Now, that effort will be made once again.

THE AMERICANS are hoping that Arafat's exit from Lebanon, his reception in Cairo and the prospects of his resuming dialogue with Hussein will spark new momentum in the broader peace process, even without any easing of the situation in Lebanon. In an interview released last Sunday, Reagan departed from his earlier approach by noting that progress in promoting his peace plan no longer need await events in Lebanon. He cited the Arafat-Mubarak meeting as a key factor in convincing Washington to push ahead on both fronts.

U.S. officials still express confidence they will manage to bring Israel, despite its rhetoric, to the bargaining table if Hussein should win a mandate from Arafat. The Americans had braced for an angry Israeli response to their decision to welcome the Arafat-Mubarak meeting, but they remain convinced that they can "contain" Israel. They cite the enhanced U.S.-Israeli strategic relationship that surfaced during Reagan's summit in late November with Prime Minister Shamir.

In Washington officials have been perplexed by what they insist has been Israel's "over-reaction" these past few days. Under Secretary of State Lawrence Eagleburger, one of Israel's best friends in the administration, has been charged with "stroking" Israel in order to make sure that it does not get "carried away" in complaining about the revived U.S. courtship of Jordan and the PLO.

That's why he invited Ambassador Meir Rosenne to the State Department on Tuesday. Only a few days earlier, Rosenne protested against the Arafat-Mubarak meeting during a similar meeting with Eagleburger. Sensing the increasingly angry mood in Jerusalem, the administration decided it was important to send a reassuring signal.

But that should not leave anyone under illusions. There still is a very fundamental disagreement between Washington and Jerusalem — not only over the future of the West Bank and Gaza, but even over the more basic question of Yasser Arafat and the PLO.

Shamir and other Israeli officials have made it clear they have no intention of dealing with Arafat under any circumstances — even if he should genuinely moderate his views. But the Reagan team, like the Carter and Ford Administrations, is still very willing — and even eager — to open a direct dialogue with him, provided that he Washington's long-standing minimal conditions — no recognition of Israel's right to self-determination and acceptance of UN Security Council Resolutions 242 and

In trying to generate a movement in Lebanon and broader peace process, the administration has gone full circle in its policies — from severe relations with Israel, including embargoes and other sanctions closer strategic ties, including significantly increased military assistance. The Reagan administration has moved from condemnations of the PLO's Syrians, in not-so-discreet over to both. It has used its military power to make a peace in Lebanon, yet turned the cheek in the crucial days immediately following the home Marine headquarters in Beirut.

The wooing of the PLO some U.S. officials will do in thinking "orientation on the many Reagan policy-making the whole question might be in any case since it is very clear that Arafat and Hussein's own act together.

The writer is the Washington correspondent of The Jerusalem Post.

ONLY SIX WEEKS ago, as West Bankers and Gazans, like other Palestinians, waited for the ceasefire between pro- and anti-Arafat forces in Tripoli to stabilize, there was uniform support for "Abu Ammar," as the PLO chairman is popularly referred to.

As the slaughter of Palestinian by Palestinian continued and despair in the territories became almost palpable, even recognized radical voices in the area, like former Nablus mayor Bassam Shak'a and the weekly al-Mithaq, were forced to come out in public support of Arafat's leadership and condemn the fighting.

But an East Jerusalem lawyer, a canny observer of his own people's politics, said that this was only lip-service in the face of overwhelming public outrage at the fighting in Tripoli.

He was proved correct last week, following Arafat's well-publicized sulha with President Hosni Mubarak of Egypt. Shak'a said that Arafat's action was contrary to decisions of the Palestine National Council. His colleague on the now-banned National Guidance Committee, Dr. Haider Abdul Shaif of Gaza, said that the meeting was "a regrettable occurrence."

Al-Mithaq was even blunter. "We had a leader, we had a symbol and he is no longer," it said.

BY AND LARGE, however, local Palestinians have publicly and privately welcomed the apparent rapprochement between the PLO — in the eyes of most still autoically represented by Arafat — and Egypt.

Watch on the West Bank

Rashad Shawwa, former mayor of Gaza and one of the grand old men of Palestinian politics, was adamant that most Palestinians supported the meeting. "It should have happened two or three years ago," he told the leading East Jerusalem daily, Al-Quds, which played up the meeting, like all the other dailies.

Al-Quds left no doubt where its sympathies lay. "All the tongues that object should be silent" was the headline of its lead item. The paper carried nearly a page of reactions to the meeting, leading off with former Ramallah mayor Karim Khalaf, once regarded as another leading radical figure.

"I am surprised at those who have criticized the meeting," Khalaf said. "Arafat visited the Egypt of Mubarak, not that of Sadat. The visit is a great political victory for the Palestinians because Egypt has returned to cooperating with the PLO."

The argument that Egypt will be able to re-establish its legitimacy in the Arab world through Arafat and the PLO, was repeated by several others and — somewhat ironically — also taken up by Israeli analysts who prepare Foreign Ministry background briefing papers. The idea of using the PLO as a tool for advancing Egypt's inter-Arab interests lay behind former President Gamal Abdel Nasser's efforts in establishing the organization in June 1964, the Israeli researchers point out, in a paper otherwise dedicated to minimizing the role of Arafat and the PLO in Middle East politics.

AT THE SAME TIME, while Arafat can take comfort from the overwhelming support he still seems to enjoy among local Palestinians, he is also incessantly being told to come to an agreement with King Hussein of Jordan. Mustafa Natshe, the recently deposed mayor of Hebron, urged that Arafat should next concentrate on Jordan because of the historic ties between the Jordanian and the Palestinian peoples.

Until now, Arafat has appeared to take the support of the West Bank and Gaza generally for granted. They have never really delivered him or the PLO an ultimatum, and it is certainly debatable whether, leaderless as they are, they are really capable of doing so. Nonetheless, given the split within the organization, their weight in his plans for the future must have increased.

EAST JERUSALEM papers have also played up Arafat's trial balloons about establishing a government-in-exile. No one appears yet to understand quite what is intended, and the idea is being dismissed as more of a change in form than in real content.

More radical circles are treating the idea with caution; to them it implies abandoning one of the basic and near-sacred slogans of the Palestinian movement — the legitimacy of armed struggle in achieving its aims. At best, they say, a "government-in-exile" would become the political arm of a movement which would still retain its fighters — much like the Political Department of the Jewish Agency and the Hagana before the foundation of the state.

Such a government should be formed only when it has something concrete to address itself to, they argue. At the moment, they feel nothing real is being offered, and that it is still the PLO's advantage to wait while others make efforts at resolving the conflict.

THE MORE MODERATE and generally pro-Jordanian figures — possibly prompted by a realization of lost opportunities and a pressing sense of urgency — are more open to the idea.

For a long time they have been urging that the PLO and the Arab world accept the principle of majority rather than unanimous decisions, which automatically give small and more radical interests the power of veto.

The major advantage, they argue, would be that such a government could act effectively and enjoy even greater international recognition. If, released from the necessity of obtaining unanimous decisions, such a government were to endorse an agreement with King Hussein of Jordan and even accept U.N. resolutions relevant to the conflict, they could then expect American recognition.

Without that, these figures say, the Palestinians have no hope of achieving any of their demands, since American pressure on Israel is a prerequisite to any acceptable settlement.

YASSER ARAFAT's meeting with Egypt's Hosni Mubarak in Cairo last week was, on the face of it, a monumental blunder.

His urge to embrace the leader of the only Arab country formally at peace with Israel, less than 48 hours after narrowly avoiding a Syrian-backed bid to unseat him for what was viewed as his own "soft" line on the Jewish state, has been widely seen as, at best, a foolhardy act of defiance aimed at Syria and its protégés in the PLO — and, at worst, an act of sheer desperation by a founderling man clutching at whatever political straw happens to come his way.

The meeting has not only unleashed a storm inside the PLO, with even those who supported Arafat, or at least remained neutral, during his months-long confrontation with the PLO rebels condemning the encounter and calling for his ouster; it has evoked almost no support in the Arab world, and even Jordan and Saudi Arabia, the two Arab states who might have been expected to applaud it, have been markedly reserved in their reactions.

Arafat would appear, then, to have squandered, through an act of astounding ineptitude, much of the very considerable political credit with which he emerged from his military debacle in Lebanon.

And those who have a healthy respect for Arafat's capacity for political survival, if for nothing else, are now waiting for the wily PLO chief to squirm out of his latest predicament and shift direction once again in a bid to save his political scalp.

That, however, is not bow the Hebrew University's Matti Steinberg, one of Israel's most knowledgeable authorities on the PLO, views the situation.

STEINBERG concedes that there may have been an element of spite in Arafat's decision to meet with Mubarak, a desire to "get back at" Syria and the PLO rebels, but he totally rejects any notion that it was an act of desperation.

On the contrary, Steinberg is convinced that Arafat's move was carefully planned even before he left Tripoli, and that he had taken into account the negative reaction it would elicit, even among some of his own supporters.

Not unlike Sadat's visit to Jerusalem six years ago, Arafat's decision to visit Cairo was a conscious attempt to break political and psychological barriers by a man infused with a new sense of destiny and confident of his strength as the unchallengeable symbol of Palestinian nationalism.

This new perception of his destiny, Steinberg suggests, was the direct outcome of his latest experience in Northern Lebanon, from which, despite his overwhelming military defeat at the hands of the Syrian-backed rebels, he emerged, if anything, politically strengthened.

No longer does he appear to view himself as bound by the need to place Palestinian unity above all else, Steinberg notes, an imperative that in the past has prevented any radical change in direction by the Palestinian movement.

Arafat's options

By DAVID BERNSTEIN

It was this commitment to consensus politics that prevented Arafat from giving Jordan's King Hussein the mandate he sought last March to enter into the peace process under President Reagan's Middle East initiative. And it was his apparent abandonment of this principle that enabled him to take the possibly even more far-reaching step of meeting with Mubarak last week.

STEINBERG is convinced that the storm of protest the Mubarak meeting raised in the PLO did not take Arafat by surprise, and neither is he unduly concerned by it.

While he would rather have the support of George Habash's Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine and Naif Hawatme's Democratic Front for the Liberation of Palestine — the two largest PLO groups after his own mainstream Fatah — he no longer views this as essential. He would now be prepared to alienate them if they continue to hamstring his new political strategy.

What really matters to him is the continued support of the Fatah leadership and of the Palestine National Congress (PNC). Steinberg believes he is more or less assured of the support of the former, as even those who might be having some misgivings about his latest moves are too far committed to him to switch camps now. As for the PNC, the Palestinian "parliament," Steinberg believes that Arafat can safely count not only on a majority, but the two-thirds plurality needed to approve any radical PLO policy shift.

The PNC is, in fact, due to convene in February for what Steinberg indicates could be one of its most momentous meetings, with Arafat prepared to depart from past tradition of always insisting on a consensus, and entering into an open confrontation with his rivals in a bid to secure that two-thirds plurality.

This would inevitably lead to a break-up of the PLO — but it would give Arafat the mandate he requires to represent the Palestinians as he sees fit.

HIS MEETING with Mubarak has undoubtedly opened up new political vistas for Arafat, and Steinberg is convinced that if he manages to survive the next few months physically, there could well be some dramatic movement in the Middle East peace process.

In the first place, the rapprochement with Egypt will undoubtedly strengthen Arafat's hand in his dealing with King Hussein if their dialogue ever resumes which most observers now regard as inevitable.

Arafat will thus be able to drive a far harder bargain with Hussein than he could have done, says Steinberg, in March, by making it plain to the King that he and the Reagan Plan are not his only options, and that if his demands for Palestinian self-determination in the West Bank are not met, he will bypass Jordan and coordinate his moves with Egypt.

This could have far-reaching consequences, including the establishment of a Palestinian government in exile — something Arafat has been toying with for some time now — and, not inconceivably, acceptance of an amended version of UN Security Council Resolution 242.

Acceptance of 242 is Washington's minimum condition for its recognition of the PLO as a legitimate partner for dialogue and potential party to any peace initiative, and, Steinberg recalls, it is something Egypt has long been pressing Arafat to do.

In fact, the Egyptian-French initiative, launched soon after Israel's invasion of Lebanon in an attempt to salvage a "political victory" for Arafat out of his military debacle there and still pending before the UN, is based on PLO acceptance of 242 amended to recognize the Palestinians' right to self-determination and to incorporate the principle of mutual recognition between Israel and a Palestinian entity in the West Bank.

What is more, the Soviet Union has indicated that it, too, is in favour of the PLO accepting 242, for this would bring Moscow back into the picture.

Moscow could thus be expected to bring some pressure to bear on its own protégés in the PLO to Arafat in any such move — foremost Hawatme, who Habash, while criticizing meeting with Mubarak, closed the way to cooperation with him.

TO JUDGE from Washington's positive response to the meeting, it, too, would welcome a radically reformed PLO committed to peace with Israel on the basis of 242 — even if it meant to recognize such were to precipitate a crisis with Israel, and even if it have some misgivings renewed Soviet role in the East peace process.

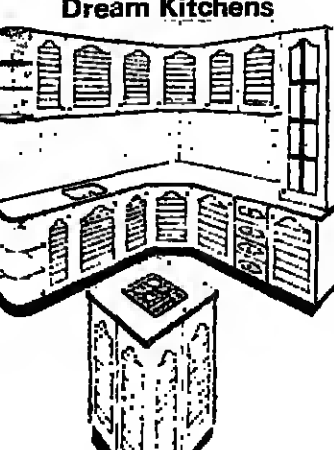

Arafat has in the past rejected not only because it recognizes the Palestinians' nationhood, but because it recognizes Israel's right to exist within 1967 borders.

Steinberg believes that I prepared to accept the territorial compromise now would go for a Palestine; the West Bank and Gaza. "So," Steinberg concludes, "no means inconceivable if months ahead, following February's PNC meeting, will be launching a dramatic political offensive, very likely deep Egyptian involvement that last week's visit to the first move in this direction."

The one thing that Arafat is an assassin's bul that, Steinberg notes, means a remote possibility Syria's resolve to make chief pay the appropriate price for his military Lebanon.

THE JERUSALEM POST

WAS AN extremely short session. In fact, it only lasted a few minutes. But after all, Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin was kidnapped when he proclaimed to the world that a new era had arrived between Israel and the PLO.

It was the tart comment of the former prime minister, Rabin, on the government's reaction to official satisfaction in Washington over the Cairo agreement between President Hosni Mubarak and PLO chairman Yasser Arafat last week.

Talking about a new era does square with the fact that the Administration knew about the Arafat-Arafat meeting ahead, helped arrange it, and urged the two men to get together. Rabin told me in the set building.

A tone of wise rebuke, Rabin said. "The trouble with this government is that it doesn't look the facts in the face. For instance, its entire reaction to the question of Arafat's return from Tripoli was inaction, although the government is it put up a deliberate screen.

Evening the evacuation of it was impossible for us, yet the government created the impression it wanted Arafat to stay in Lebanon — despite our stated purpose of getting all foreign forces out of Lebanon.

While the government was going along here, the U.S. Administration was steadily proceeding with its plan to pluck Arafat out of Tripoli and place him in a little so that he could give King Hussein of Jordan a call go-ahead."

During Rabin's analysis an internal political development is a sheer intellectual pleasure. Every you may say about his attitude picture, you have the feeling that he understands the elements of the situation better than anybody in the present government. He does not wear the blinkers that are so obvious on some others, nor is he swayed by the irrational reactions of a former administration which influence other tiers.

IN READILY admits that the held by Shamir and Defence Minister Moshe Arens in London took place in a very lively atmosphere, but suggests the government never understood what lay behind the illness.

It is sure that after June 1984 the Administration will withdraw Marines from Lebanon. "I told the Secretary of State Lawrence Shriver that the actions of the

Reassessing relations

"The Americans want a face-saving solution in Lebanon, and they don't want to wait"

(David Rubinger)

Soviet Union and other countries will help determine who'll be the next man in the White House, if the Marines stay in Beirut during the election campaign," Rabin confided.

Recalling the steady objection of Defence Secretary Caspar Weinberger to the American military presence in Lebanon, Rabin referred to "that Pentagon general who said, 'It's the wrong war, at the wrong time, in the wrong place and without a partner.'"

"I believe that President Reagan is gradually realizing this is a no-win war," says Rabin. "And Pentagon generals don't like no-win wars. America cannot win any political achievements in Lebanon because it cannot alter the military facts there. It cannot do a repeat of Grenada."

Rabin suggests that there are people in the Pentagon who have been saying that 100,000 American soldiers in Lebanon could knock Syria out and alter the facts on the ground. They know this idea is fanciful, and are suggesting it because they want to attain a practical objective which is precisely the opposite: a total American withdrawal.

"I agree with the prevailing view in the Pentagon that Syria and the Soviet Union together have more influence on the future of Lebanon than Israel and the United States together," says Rabin. "There can be no solutions to Lebanon's future without Syria. What Israel can handle is the zone 45 km. north of the border, which is essential for security. But I wouldn't predict how long we can continue to handle it if we don't reckon with Syria."

He points out that events in Lebanon are being dominated by Syria and its Druse and Shi'ite allies at the present time. "They're working hand in hand to prevent the emergence of a strong central government. True, the Druse are not letting the PLO terrorists establish themselves in the Shouf Mountains. But that's a separate matter."

Rabin says that the U.S. Administration wants to facilitate its own withdrawal from Lebanon next year, in a manner which will enable it to save face, by having the IDF stay put for the next three to six months at least.

"It is ready to pay us a price — but a non-political price. A bigger grant. More military aid. Declarations of intent with regard to offset purchases and a free trade area, the practical implications of which still remain to be seen."

Rabin believes that the Pentagon is resisting the strategic cooperation agreement with Israel to this very day. "The Pentagon's reservations were intensified after the Shi'ite terrorist attacks in Kuwait. The generals worried that terrorism was threatening to undermine the Persian Gulf oil states and was bypassing Israel. And they could not forget the fact that the real arena of superpower rivalry in this part of the world, since the Second World War, is over Arabian oil."

For the Pentagon, the central issue for decades has been holding ground in the oil states, or losing ground. So, from the generals' point of view, the Lebanon affair — which they never agreed with — has boomeranged against American interests in a more important region.

"By now, this line of reasoning has influenced the White House, too. And in any case, the American public doesn't see any sense in the whole Beirut operation, and never did. No wonder people like Walter Mondale and Jesse Jackson are criticizing the way they do, and precisely at this time," Rabin says.

WHEN RABIN talks, one never feels that the phrases mould the ideas, that the form dictates the content. His line of reasoning takes him only as far as he wants to go, and no further. He quotes statesmen and politicians, strategic analyses and newspaper comment — not philosophers and writers. He doesn't look for intellectual crutches; perhaps that's one reason he's been accused of intellectual arrogance at times.

Rabin gives some credence to what he calls "a rumour" that U.S. leaders have told President Amin Jemayel they give him five months to establish wider control in his country. "The Americans want a face-saving solution in Lebanon, and they don't want to wait," he told The Post.

"So, by June, if Israel has not made any new moves in Lebanon, it could stay there, alone with its soldiers, and perhaps come under American pressure to withdraw before the minimal conditions for the security of the northern border have been assured," he warned.

The former chief of staff does not think much of the strategic cooperation agreement with the United States, which Shamir boasted about so much on his return from Washington and about which former Defence Minister Ariel Sharon boasted even more, in his day.

"Why did we have to run after the Americans?" he asks. "Should they be interested in strategic cooperation, they know our address. Nor do I think much of their prepositioning their stores here. My first concern is for Israel's security interests."

HE SNORTS at the theory that this country can deploy the IDF on a large scale and at Israel's own initiative to attain long-range political and military objectives. (He knows the father of that theory, Sharon, only too well, from decades in uniform together. Yet, when Rabin was prime minister, he went out of his way to engage Sharon as a security adviser, which made some people wonder.)

"The war in Lebanon has proved conclusively that you can't force normalization and peace in this region with military superiority; you can't bring Palestine Arab terrorism to an end with an invasion; you can't land Syria the sort of military blow which would be effective in the long term."

"However, Israel could attain a reasonable, though far from ideal, security arrangement in a 40 to 45 km. strip of Southern Lebanon, provided it does not stipulate a Syrian withdrawal from Lebanon or the emergence of a strong government in Beirut."

"What I mean," says Rabin, "is a partial unilateral implementation of the security clauses in the Israel-Lebanon agreement."

"It entails local brigades between the border and the Zahrani River and the deployment of UNIFIL between the Zahrani and the Awail River. Syria and the Soviet Union, who have no objections in principle to UNIFIL, would jump at the idea of getting the Western military presence out of Lebanon and waving the Multinational Force goodbye."

Drawing on his own intimate knowledge of Congressional, public and media opinion in the United States — a knowledge which is probably less hidebound and more perceptive than that of anybody in today's government — Rabin says: "I had reservations about the multinational force idea from the start, because we always had a moral argument vis a vis the American public. We often repeated to them that Israel did not want one single drop of American blood to be shed in our interests."

"Now it's true that it wasn't Israel's idea to put Marines into Beirut and that they aren't there for our security. But we still have to stress to the Americans that we don't want their soldiers to assume any responsibility in Southern Lebanon."

RABIN HAS no illusions about who has come out on top in Lebanon. "Syria is sitting pretty. It doesn't need to make another war over Lebanon, and its soldiers don't need to fire a single shot. Nor, of course, does the Soviet Union. They both have agents doing the shooting on their behalf; militias battling with the sovereign government. What could be more ideal for Damascus and Moscow? What could be worse for Washington?"

He sees UNIFIL as a screen to keep the Syrian units in Lebanon from advancing and to be an effective barrier against "most" terrorist forces. Although there was some terrorist infiltration and shooting before the 1982 war, he concedes, the PLO needed to fire real artillery in order to leapfrog effectively over the UNIFIL zone at a time when it was narrow.

He believes Israel could take the wind out of the Shi'ite sails and neutralize their hostility by proving that it is not in Lebanon to remain as a conqueror. It could also show that it will not serve as an agent of the Jemayel regime to suppress them. "Then we could help the Southern Shi'ites to build a military force solely destined to keep out the PLO."

The obstacle to his concept, says Rabin, is Shamir's insisting, to this very day, on the evacuation of all foreign forces, including the Syrians. "If our prime minister has his way, we'll still be sitting in Lebanon in 1994," Rabin warns.

"But I wouldn't fire another shot to shape the future of Lebanon or thwart the creation of a Greater Syria. There is only one reason to justify making war: to ensure the existence of my country."

FOCUS

HOW WAS RESPONSIBLE for the dramatic fall in the value of bank shares last October? The general consensus is that it was the banks. They went on pushing up the price of their stock when other prices were dropping. An actual collapse was only averted by the intervention of the Treasury, in an unprecedented move, underwrote the value of bank shares.

While these verbal strictures cast the conduct of the banks as being made, no answer was given. The banks preferred to maintain a low profile. That does not mean they agreed with the critics. Japhet, veteran head of Bank Leumi, Israel's highest financial authority, attributes the public disquiet in part to the unpopularity of banking fraternity as a whole. "There is at least a grudge against the system. Here (that is lacking). We are disliked being too big and too independent" (that is, of public concern). "We are abused for possessing too much money, irrespective of the fact that it all belongs either to depositors or our shareholders."

Why did the banks push up the price of their own shares? "We are obliged to undertake the responsibility of stabilizing our prices. Personally it was very hard against my will, as I told ministers repeatedly. The compelling reason was the nature of the capital market. The market compels the big institutional investors (pension funds like) to place the bulk of funds in government bonds. In countries they are free to invest in will, which makes them an important stabilizing factor in the capital market."

During prudent organizations continued with the long term, the pension funds operate anti-cyclically, buy when a security drops, sell when it rises excessively. The regulator does the opposite. The groups tend to cancel each other out.

In Israel the speculator rules. There is nobody to offset the gains he creates. The banks do the job, they fill a vacuum, declares Japhet.

The purpose was stabilization, and the banks press the price of shares up to unrealistic levels. "The business world has been against the government for funds, Treasury bonds, in unlimited quantities, fixed at a price in the market, because they were fully linked to the price of the stock. The investor wanted something more if he was to put his money into equity."

Why so much more? Because that is the state of the market, according to Japhet. "The demand for bank shares rose, yet the finance minister, for reasons of his own, did not allow us to make new issues."

He does not believe the Treasury obliged to underwrite the bank

David Krivine

The Post's David Krivine meets banker Ernest Japhet

'We are disliked for being too big and independent' shares, it wasn't strictly necessary. "I can't get over-excited by the plight of the shareholders; they benefited from a marvellous yield for several years." Easy profits are not, and should not be that easy; shares which rise too high are bound to drop again sooner or later. "I told the Commercial and Industrial Club a year ago (on December 31, 1982) that the market was overheated."

A check of the text reveals that he did indeed give warning. "New issues to the public have been priced at levels above those which would be implied by sober economic judgment," and: "In many cases — too many, I must emphasize — the connection between the market value of shares and their true worth has been severed." A fortnight after that speech, on 18 January 1983, the market broke.

and provoked the mass purchase of consumer goods.

"Everybody suddenly saw the light and started moving out of shekel-denominated assets, whether deposits in the bank or securities at the stock exchange. They clamoured for dollar-denominated assets, or for plain cash dollars."

"The last liquid Israeli-shekel asset was the bank shares. The banks tried to keep up their value. In August, Aridor began devaluing the shekel and cutting the budget, but it was too little and too late."

The banks were also guilty, surely; they borrowed foreign currency abroad to bolster their shares. Isn't that so? "Not entirely. Bank shares were traded not only for foreign currency, nor was the inflow of dollars primarily for that purpose. The public was busy buying dollars, and the supply of that commodity had to be kept up. It was not a crisis of the banking system; it was a crisis of confidence in the economic management of the state."

What would have happened if the Treasury had not underwritten the price of bank shares? "They would have dropped in value — as indeed they have done anyway, by over 40 per cent."

Why has this latest drop occurred? Is it because the public does not trust the government's promise to redeem them six years hence? "No, I don't think that's the reason. The holdup is that there is no cash around at the moment. It is a temporary stoppage. Once people get over the shock of these recent events, things will straighten out."

Would not a still greater tumble in those shares have precipitated a run on the banks, and didn't Aridor's guarantee prevent that?

Japhet smiles patiently. "There was no cause for panic. The function of the banking system is one thing, the price of its shares on the stock exchange another. Other company shares have tumbled, no Treasury guarantees were supplied — and despite that, the companies are operating successfully as before."

Mightn't foreign-currency deposits at least have been withdrawn? Japhet thinks not. No signs were felt of such a contingency. Foreign-currency deposits in Israel's banks amount to $61.1 half of it in Bank Leumi. A tiny proportion of the sum (around 3 per cent) was withdrawn — and would you believe it? "Half of those withdrawals were re-deposited," he grins. "In the foreign subsidiaries of Israeli banks."

every $100 of share value last October. What it is providing is a dollar linkage plus 0.75 per cent interest a year. If bank stocks improve by 10 per cent per annum in dollar terms, they will have caught up with and overtaken the price offered by the Treasury."

So the government is not exposed to a heavy outlay under this seemingly rash undertaking? Japhet thinks not, but adds a rider: "Provided always that the authorities allow a normal growth and development of the banking system."

Is that another way of saying that the banks should be allowed to charge high interest rates and fancy prices for their services?

"There is no doubt that the profit performance of the banking system has been adversely affected by the government's monetary policy, which was out of tune with the country's economic needs; and by the serious penalties which the administration imposed on the banks in a desperate bid to hold galloping inflation in check."

"We were not allowed to adjust our interest rates in accordance with the change in prices, so that for periods of time we were receiving negative interest-rates. This cut into our profits considerably."

"All we want is permission to charge a real interest. The price of our lendings should be higher than the prevailing level of inflation; high enough to let us — taking into account the liquidity regulations" (which freeze a proportion of deposits at low interest in the vaults of the central bank) — "offer a proper return to our depositors."

"As to bank fees, they should be sufficient to cover the cost of the services we render, not more than that."

Has not this cost been excessive in the past, considering that only now are the banks making economies and closing down superfluous branches — which must have been expensive to run?

"You must remember how we acquired those branches. There was, in Finance Minister Pinhas Sapir's days a phase of consolidation when, with the encouragement of the authorities, the big banks bought out the small banks and were stuck with the various branch offices."

"Closing them down in the hot-house economic atmosphere that prevailed was easier said than done. It was hard to fire people. Mayors and local politicians kept asking us why we had no branch in their township or neighbourhood."

"Don't forget," he adds, "we could not open a new branch without the express authorization of the Bank of Israel."

"There have been attempts to economize all the same. Bank Leumi closed down ten branches in 1982, quietly and without making a fuss about it."

THE BANKS ADVISE clients on their investments. Is there not a conflict of interest here and should not the banks desist from this kind of activity?

"You are talking about the British and American system of limiting the banks' role to commercial banking. Israel has adopted the continental system, which makes us into universal bankers. We do everything, commercial banking, investment banking, underwriting, brokerage; we are a kind of super-market of financial services."

"I doubt whether having the investment function off would work. Only the banks are big enough to handle this complex and costly activity. Only they have the day-to-day contact with a wide section of the population.

"Not that we derive any great satisfaction from carrying out this task. The transactions are mostly small and the commissions don't cover outgoings. Investment brokers are losing ground in the U.S. today for that reason, and there is a move there towards the European system."

"The Germans appointed a commission to examine whether their universal-banker system should be changed, and after long study decided to preserve the status quo."

"What I do believe is that investment advisers ought to undergo special training courses. Also, more comprehensive and reliable information should be provided to the public about companies bidding for their capital."

Should not the investment advisers in the banks have egg on their faces, after recommending the purchase of shares whose value proceeded to fall? "Yes, it was a traumatic experience for some of our managers. They feel not only despised, they feel let down. They acted in good faith, they didn't anticipate that the stock market would brusquely move in another direction."

Were they pushing the shares of their own banks for selfish reasons? Japhet looks reproachful: "They don't get a cash bonus for doing that, you know."

Gazing at the future, should the banks retain the power to buy and sell their own shares? "What you are saying is 'Should our policy of stabilization continue?' You must remember that we lack in Israel some of the elements which normally function in a fully-fledged stock exchange."

"Ours is a young exchange, it has not yet developed all the checks and balances necessary for smooth operation." There are too many ups and downs, for lack of countervailing forces. "A capital market is not influenced exclusively by economic considerations — outside factors are at work, notably the confusing one of mass psychology."

"I would say that if the big pension funds were liberated by the Treasury to invest in the open market, then our participation in the work of stabilization would no longer be necessary. Until that happens I must admit albeit reluctantly that our banks will have to go on with the job."

"Meanwhile there should be more supervision by the Securities Commission and by the stock exchange itself." All these procedural problems will however lose their importance, he believes, if normal conditions are restored in the economy at large. "The overriding necessity is to bring back popular confidence in the economic system and in the administration of the country."

Sharing the share burden

By YOSEF GOELL / Jerusalem Post Reporter

Yoram Bar Sela

ISRAEL'S banks, those financial institutions who not so long ago were busy themselves in advertising as "the nation's oxygen," are exactly at the height of their popularity. Nor are their directors. The main reason for their fall into universal obloquy is, of course, collapse of the bank shares at beginning of October. Despite the fact that the Bank of Israel, in wake of that crisis, has spent tens of dollars to support the price of the shares of the Five banks, these shares have been selling at close to 50 per cent of market value at the beginning of October.

The efforts of the bankers, the Treasury and Bank of Israel have devoted primarily to hammering out and implementing a scheme to cut most of the share-holding and to restore a modicum of confidence in the banking system. It is week the compensation has begun to operate with the bank shares being invited to be sold and sign up for the shares being offered.

Treasury-Bank of Israel-Big Five scheme provides for the following:

Treasury will undertake to repurchase in five years' time all shares of the Big Five banks which were sold to the public on October 6. In 1988 it will buy the shares at a rate of 104 per cent of their market value on October 6, linked to the dollar rate of that date on the eve of the 23 per cent devaluation of the shekel.

Alternatively, the public will be able to turn its bank shares into savings schemes (up to a maximum of $500,000 per person) to be repurchased at a rate of 104 per cent, linked to the dollar.

NEW UNIVERSITY math professor Shmuel Kaniel, together with other professors, has applied to the High Court to cancel this agreement, arguing that it constitutes a high disregard for the public interest.

Kaniel argues that the agreement, if implemented, will be Treasury — and more importantly, the Israeli taxpayer — an unfunded and unnecessary outlay of $2 billion; and, if many holders choose the four- or five-year alternatives, even less than that.

The applicants have submitted alternative proposals of their own. All of this could possibly merit a postscript on the editorial page of The Jerusalem Post if it were not for the fact that on November 28, the High Court, presided over by Justice Meir Shamgar, did not reject the application out of hand.

Over the strenuous objections of deputy attorney-general Yoram Bar Sela, representing the State, the High Court ruled that the Treasury and the Bank of Israel must give due consideration forthwith to the alternative proposals submitted by Kaniel and his associates.

Although these alternative proposals were submitted in detail some time ago, the authorities are only now beginning to give them a fair hearing. Since the government and the Bank of Israel, not to mention the Big Five banks, have staked their prestige on the implementation of the officially agreed scheme, there would seem to be some truth in Kaniel's charge that they have been purposely dragging their feet in carrying out the High Court's order.

WE MET Kaniel, a feisty Jerusalemite who has been involved in previous political-legal battles (over such issues as electoral reform and the method of distributing Knesset seats), in his spartan office at the Givat Ram campus.

He started off explaining double integrals, and I stopped him by admitting that the only college course I ever flunked was integral calculus. At which point we returned to earth, and his arguments became crystal clear.

The total value of outstanding bank shares of the Big Five was estimated at $7.5 billion on October 6. If one deducts about $1.3 billion for shares held by vested interests which are not permitted to be compensated by the terms of the official scheme, that leaves $6.2 billion in shares which the government has committed itself to buy.

Even if the shares drop by only one-third of their value by that date, Kaniel argues, that would mean that the Treasury would be shelling out over $2 billion more in compensation than the value of the shares it is buying. If their value drops even more, the cost to the Treasury will be commensurately higher.

Kaniel argues that there is no need to spend that much money. First of all, it is unheard of for a government to compensate shareholders for their losses. But even if one accepts the political decision to pay compensation to a public that was largely misled by the banks, that compensation should not be a giveaway. Far, after all, many, if not most, of the holders of bank shares made good profits from those shares.

What Kaniel is proposing is that, instead of the blanket government guarantee, one of these vastly cheaper alternatives be adopted:

□ Make a profit and loss calculation for each shareholder individually from the date he purchased his shares, or going back four years to October 1979. Such a calculation could easily be made by computer.

Kaniel proposes that each individual shareholder be compensated in accordance with the original value of his investment in the bank shares. That would mean subtracting the profits made by each shareholder since 1979 from the value of the bank shares he held on October 6, 1983.

Kaniel estimates that such compensation would cost the Treasury only $200 million, a significantly lower sum than the $2 billion plus that the official scheme would cost.

□ Make the same calculation, but without obliging the government to buy the shares. Instead it would simply compensate the shareholder for the losses incurred, minus the profits he had made earlier from the shares. He would keep on holding the shares with the possibility of selling them at some later date.

One version of this would have the Big Five repaying the government for such compensation payments by means of specially floated bank shares. In essence, Kaniel argues, this alternative would cost the government — and thus the taxpayer — nothing.

OTHER PARTS of the proposals are much too complex for an article of this nature. But what is clear is that different parties have different expectations — and possibly delusions — concerning the future of the shares, the banks and the economy.

The bankers were desperate to get out from under the ruins of the bank-share house they had built — with a minimum of damage to confidence in their banks, to their balance sheets, and to their own prospects of continuing in office as highly-paid directors.

The Treasury, which cannot escape the charge of collusion with the banks, is seeking to avert the rage of shareholders, who are also voters, by guaranteeing a tidy, if not enormous, dollar-linked profit on the shares — if their holders only postpone the demand to cash them in for several years.

Some cynical officials believe there is no way any future government can hope to pay for such a large amount of outstanding shares, all of which are to be cashed in at the same time.

Others, however, say that the economy could very well take a turn for the better during the intervening years and that the market price of the bank shares could rise to a level higher than that guaranteed by the government.

THOSE holders of bank shares who rushed to sell their shares even prior to the conclusion of the official compensation agreement, at a loss of between one-third to one-half of their value have obviously acted on the former belief: that there is no basis for confidence in the government's promise or ability to redeem the shares in five years' time.

Kaniel has another interesting point. It is obvious that many shareholders stand to gain from the arrangement. But all of them are also taxpayers who will lose from the higher taxes needed to finance the compensation payments in five years.

He has calculated the point at which a given shareholder's gain is balanced by his loss as a taxpayer: for the average taxpayer to break even, he would have to have had $8,000 worth of bank shares on October 6. At October's rates, only shareholders holding close to $500,000 in bank shares break even.

New System for Paying Insurance Premiums

In view of the inflationary conditions in the economy, and in order to make insurance procedures more efficient, improve the security enjoyed by the insured, and keep down insurance costs — on January 1, 1984, a new arrangement will come into effect for collecting premiums for comprehensive vehicle, and apartment and apartment contents insurance.

Under the new arrangement, an insured person can choose to pay insurance premiums, by one of two methods:

- In cash — within 30 days of the date on which the policy comes into effect, by means of a cheque made out to the insurance company, deposited at the offices of the company, or at any bank.
 - In instalments — by means of a standing order given to your bank, in favour of your insurance company. There will be an additional charge for the credit extended.
- The new arrangement applies to all member companies of the Israel Association of Insurance Companies, and applies to all insured by these companies.

Details may be clarified at your insurance company or insurance agent.

British pop group Musical Youth arrived in Israel this week for a short concert tour beginning tomorrow night with a show at Jerusalem's Binyanei Ha'uma. The five-member group, aged 11 to 15, topped the British charts late last year with the single "Pass the Dutchie" and the album "Youth of Today."

nor were planning committee meetings held with representatives of local authorities.

The Jerusalem District Labour Court heard both sides involved in the postal workers dispute — ministry officials and works committee and Histadrut representatives — at 10 a.m. yesterday, just six hours before temporary back-to-work orders were to expire.

The postal workers, among the lowest-paid civil servants, told Judge Nechemiah Goodman that they were ready to stay on their jobs if their demands were considered. The judge told the sides to negotiate for a week. If they don't reach an agreement by Thursday, they should return to the court for another hearing.

Yosef Deri, head of the postal employees' works committee, said that if a solution is not found, they will resume strikes.

The Histadrut Clerks Union warned last night that it will declare a work dispute unless the pay scale of the country's 70,000 employees is raised "soon."

The union says such an upward adjustment — which must be effective retroactively to October 1 — was promised the workers when the work agreement was signed last year.

The sanctions will be "very painful," the union's secretary-general, Eliahu Reif, said yesterday.

The threatened dispute would spread the labour unrest to the non-governmental public-service sector. So far, disruptions have affected the civil service only.

The scope of the present disruptions will be enlarged today by the Defence Ministry employees. They had been prevented from taking action by a Tel Aviv Labour Court temporary injunction — but magistrate Steve Adler on Monday turned down management's request for an extension.

Defence Ministry workers will stop payments to medium and major suppliers today. But bills under a few million shekels will be honoured, the head of the workers' actions committee, Haim Uman, said.

Lorincz: No 'revolutionary' economy moves likely today

Jerusalem Post Reporter

TEL AVIV. — No "revolutionary" economic decisions will be taken at today's cabinet meeting, Shlomo Lorincz, chairman of the Knesset Finance Committee, yesterday assured members of the Israel Insurance Association at their annual meeting. "However," he noted thoughtfully, "spirits and demons were created on the eve of Shabbat, and this meeting is taking place on the eve of Shabbat."

Lorincz said he expected today's discussions to be devoted to two main topics: Cutting the budget drastically, and future monetary policy. "As for cutting the budget, not only will it be trimmed away, but actual flesh will be cut." There was no other way to slow the inflationary spiral and reduce the adverse balance of payments, he said.

"Our good friends in the U.S. have been generous with help, but you can't expect them to cut their own budget while we in Israel continue to waste money," he said that $2 billion must be pared from the budget, and that there would likely be agreement on this figure.

However, he predicted, "each cabinet minister will fight to protect his own ministry, generously offering to find places where the other ministries can effect substantial savings."

Steps would be taken to reduce the amount of money in the public's hands by sharply cutting credits. This would reduce imports, "and we won't even extend more credits to exporters to help them in their drive," Lorincz said he hoped exports would increase by 30 per cent in 1984 and imports would drop. However, it was impossible to impose import taxes without violating the agreement with the Common Market, but he did think "that a solution would be found since our friends in Europe will try to help us in our plight."

"As for 1984, unless the Messiah comes, we will see the standard of living dropping to that of 1981. Wages will drop by seven to 11 per cent by April 1, and

Guest relaxes at Mishkenot Sha'ananim

(Arnold Newman)

CULTURAL ASSET

By ABRAHAM RABINOVICH/Jerusalem Post Reporter

ITS OPENING 10 years ago was one of the most elegant occasions ever seen in Jerusalem, a city not normally given to glitter. There were candlelit tables set up on the outdoor terraces, a full moon, beautiful people, a superb buffet dinner and Pablo Casals in one of his last public dialogues with his cello.

Turning Mishkenot Sha'ananim, the first residence built outside the Old City walls, into a guest house for visiting intellectuals and artists was part of a plan to restructure Jerusalem in the post-Six Day War years. From being a provincial preserve — part synagogue, part barbed-wire encampment, part coffee house that closed early — it was to become a vibrant center.

Transforming the century-old Mishkenot into a cultural spring fed by world figures and lesser-known talents would, Mayor Teddy Kollek believed, significantly change the city's strife-ridden image and put Jerusalem in the mainstream of world culture.

The project was financed by a $2m. donation by William Levitt, builder of America's Levittowns, through the Jerusalem Foundation, which provides ongoing funding.

Less than two months after the opening, the Yom Kippur War shattered the tranquility and many of the illusions that had begun to set in over the country. In the decade since the war, however, Mishkenot Sha'ananim — The Tranquil Dwellings — has continued to fulfill the function conceived for it.

Some 4,000 guests have checked into its 10 apartments in this period. They have enriched the intellectual life of the city, carrying the word from Zion that there is more to Israel than helmeted soldiers.

SAUL BELLOW wrote To Jerusalem and Back following a stay at Mishkenot, and John Le Carré did some of his initial research on Little Drummer Girl while staying at the guest house. Marc Chagall spent time there and so did Isaac Berlin.

Victoria de los Angeles, Eric Erickson, Igor Markevitch, historian Bernard Lewis, Harold Pinter, Isaac Stern and numerous other luminaries in many disciplines. André Schwarz-Bart (Last of the Just) was one of Mishkenot's first two guests and spent the Yom Kippur War there.

Until recently Mishkenot served for the most part as a genteel hospice that provided a base for random assemblages of intellectual pilgrims, whose contact with Israelis was sporadic. Now, under new direction, it is about to become a more active cultural center that will encourage — indeed, organize — regular meetings between its guests and groups of Israelis who share their field of interests.

Behind this approach is Leon Davidoff, a retired Mexican businessman currently chairman of Mishkenot's board, and Mrs. Chagit Friedlander, the institution's new director.

"We want to make this a center for culture and an exchange of ideas that will make an impact on the creative life of the city," says Friedlander.

Guests initially stayed free of charge. However, an expected maintenance endowment fund which failed to materialize has changed this. Management declines to reveal how much is now charged, but says it is considerably less than the rates of a five-star hotel, and has considerably more to offer. Guests, who can stay up to three months, get three-room apartments with kitchenettes and a view of the Old City, maid service and the help of the Mishkenot staff in arranging meetings. Some guests come with their families.

MICHAEL LEDEEN, an American historian, thought of Israel and Mishkenot when he set out to research and write a book on his recent sabbatical.

"I wanted a place where I could find intelligent and knowledgeable people I could talk to about my ideas, with the certainty that I would get good, honest criticism. This is hard to come by in Washington. People are afraid that if they criticize someone, he will become an enemy."

In Israel, Ledeen, a senior fellow at the Centre for Strategic and International Studies at Georgetown University, met extensively with historians and political thinkers. "I found them intellectually much more aggressive, incisive and playful than [their counterparts] back home," he says. In addition to intellectual challenge, Mishkenot provided the serenity he needed to write.

For Israel's intellectual community, Mishkenot offers a measure of compensation for the country's isolation from the mainstream of western culture by permitting its members to strike sparks with first-class minds from around the world — without paying travel tax.

Mishkenot's guests are chosen by an inter-disciplinary selection committee which sometimes initiates invitations and otherwise reviews recommendations by universities and other Israeli institutions, as well as direct applications to stay at the guest house.

Although the occupancy rate in the early years was rarely less than 90 per cent, it is now about 60 per cent and Mishkenot's management hopes to raise this. In a recent interview, Davidoff said that he is considering increasing the number of rooms by subdividing existing space.

Historian Ledeen hopes that the new activist policy at Mishkenot will not be carried too far.

"I hope they're not too enthusiastic about integrating people and organizing activities," he said, as he sat out on the terrace opposite Mount Zion. "Everybody at Mishkenot is delighted that the telephone isn't ringing. That means that for hours on end nothing happens. It's a very hard thing to find in the modern world."

stations," Lapid noted. The authority is now negotiating with a U.S. company over the production of a six-part summary of the original Pillar of Fire, Lapid said. The authority doesn't have the funds to make a short version, so it hopes the U.S. firm will invest its own money in exchange for some of the profits from sales.

But only part 17, about the UN partition resolution, was translated into English for showing to TV officials and Jewish organizations abroad, Lapid said it was a "good thing" that the whole series wasn't sub-titled and translated into English, because of difficulties in selling the whole package abroad. He expects the English-language album just produced by Shikmona Press, with the cooperation of the Broadcasting Authority, to help promote sales of the series.

THE AUTHORITY produced a Hebrew-language album of the series, which includes not only the text of the 19 shows but also a wide variety of photographs and drawings. Lossin calls it a "best seller," with 60,000 copies purchased in Israel — "equivalent to four million sold in the U.S."

Lossin says he earns only a tiny percentage of the profits from sales of the album, even though it was his "baby," but the Broadcasting Authority has so far made over $100,000 from it, comprising about 10 per cent of the cost of producing the TV series.

The just cut English-language version has been printed in 10,000 copies for a start. It is likely to be popular not only among scholars and Jewish organizational leaders but also as a bar/bat mitzva gift. The Anti-Defamation League of B'nai B'rith, which is the U.S. distributor, said it would send a copy to every member of Congress for information purposes.

HY KALUS has had a 30-year relationship with Israel — always full of surprises.

When he first came from New York in 1953 to teach at the Cameri's theatre school, it closed. After turning down offers to become artistic director of the Cameri or Habimah, he finally decided to say "yes" to Habimah in the late '60s. He arrived from New York to find that the job had been given to someone else.

Kalus — trim, energetic, with greying frizzy hair and thick glasses — keeps coming back for more, but he's no masochist. He likes his success record here.

His first production was an anti-McCarthy play called The Troublemakers at the Cameri in 1953; after that Habimah invited him to do A View from the Bridge. At the time it was "betrayal of the worst kind" to go to another theatre, but the practice of freelance directing eventually became accepted in Israel.

He stayed for 13 years, acquired "a wife (actress Zehava Hess) and kids and more suitcases" and then returned to New York. But even since 1966 he has directed at least one production a year in Israel, and sometimes two or three — at the Cameri, Habimah and occasionally the Haifa Theatre.

Among his productions here: Miller's The Crucible, Anouilh's Becket, and "the longest-running production of Virginia Woolf anywhere in the world." Now he is in Tel Aviv for Quartermaine's Terms, by Simon Gray, which has just opened at the Cameri.

It depicts the lonely, trapped lives of teachers of English in a school for foreign students in Cambridge. Kalus describes it as an attempt at a "Chekhov comedy" — the "it-hurts-when-I-laugh" variety. So far the critics have been friendly about the production, but less enthusiastic about the text than he is.

HIS SUCCESS RATE elicits respect, perhaps envy — and reservations in some circles because he never does "native" Israeli works.

Theatre director Hy Kalus... a success rate that elicits respect

(Except for Ephraim Kishon's Hak'tuba, and Kishon is in a category of his own.)

What are his considerations for choosing a play to do here? Mainly "whether you can cast it, working with closed companies." He dismisses the criticism of "importing" plays, mentions his successes with My Sons and Gorky's The Lower Depths.

"These so-called foreign plays are not so foreign. If they were, they wouldn't go..." His decibel level has jumped — and probably his blood-pressure with it.

He believes that good theatre is good theatre and people are people and "any play that says something about our relationship one to another goes, dammit" and by this time he has worked himself up into a froth, pitching off the comfortable couch in the Cameri lounge and collapsing onto his knees. "Excuse me for shouting," he says. "I'm hyperthyroid."

He's an actor, not unaware of the floor-to-ceiling mirrors across the room; he is also an artist looking for "insight, not answers" — for any clue about "what to do in this snap-of-the-finger millisecond that we're on this earth."

HE DOESN'T FEEL that original Israeli works provide much of a clue. He is searing in his criticism, but won't be quoted on specifics: you can't hand out the dirty laundry and expect cooperation in the future.

Asked what he thinks of playwrights cooperating with a director early in the writing process, he says that might help, provided the director knows what the writer doesn't about the demands of the stage. He cites the precedents of Kazan working with Arthur or Tennessee Williams.

But writing has to be "fr kishkes" and not "what th around here 'good dialogue has a few choice words 'group therapy on the stag says 'one should demand bet better and more and more : go in for the quick fix'."

Sitting across the room from her in Tel Aviv, I feel a warmth that makes my cheeks flush and my palms sweat.

"Are you healing me?" I ask.

"Yes," she says, "don't worry, it's good for you."

She explains that she can diagnose illness by simply looking at a person; once she locates a source of trouble, she projects "energy" to restore balance in the diseased organism and liberate its own healing forces.

This I find impressive. After all, beat is something that can be felt. Even those who believe that life's forces should queue up to be tested in a laboratory have succeeded in photographing the abnormal emissions of "light" from the hands of psychic healers.

PSYCHIC since she was three years old (she often startled her family with her precognitive insights), Yemima began healing only two years ago, when friends asked her for help and insisted that she could heal them. At first she was dubious, not believing that she could do it.

"There was a woman with a badly swollen knee which she couldn't bend," she recalls. "After six healings, the swelling disappeared completely."

"When I sit in front of someone I concentrate on the forehead and the eyes, and fix my gaze on the point between the eyes. I see the other person's energy body — light, points of light and bars, dots and lines indicating irregularities. I build up and liberate the person's energy. From the face I can see what the person's problem is. If there's illness I can see it, and also the cause of it."

I have heard that she does graphological analysis, too. Does she diagnose disease from handwriting?

Sometimes, she says. But the piece of paper with writing on it is usually just a point of departure. Her insights come clairvoyantly, she insists. Nevertheless it helps to have something to hold on to — the client thinks the handwriting is what gives her the information, but it isn't that at all.

MUSIC REVIEWS

BORIS BERMAN must be treated with greatest respect, because of his artistic integrity. His performances are dedicated both to his art and to his audiences, for whom he presents interesting, unusual and demanding programmes. Berman's mastery of programming puts him in a category all his own.

This recital seemed characteristic of Berman's artistic credo. He opened with a most unusual Haydn, he continued with the huge Brahms-Handel variations at the centre of the first part. This was followed by works by two great Russians, a sincere and justified tribute to his roots.

Berman stressed the romanticism of Haydn's first movement with highly expressive phrasing and a mellow and singing tone. In the Brahms, Berman tackled the stupendous work with perfect technique, precision and textural clarity. It provided a constant reason to rejoice.

Shostakovich's set of Preludes and Fugues, in which the composer pays tribute to Bach but which are also marked by his unmistakable Russian soul, were another musical experience. And then, as if holding to the last, the most original and personal expression, Berman gave us the two Scriabin sonatas — No. 2, still under the spell of Chopin, and No. 4, which sets a new course.

A tremendously demanding programme had become a great evening by a great artist.

CHOIRS IN CONCERT — Choroale de Notre Dame and Choroale de Severs (France); Polifonia Miguel Fleta (Spain); Rand Afrikaans University Choir (South Africa); Trinity University Choir (U.S.) and the Orkney Choir and Western Galilee Choir, Israel (Jerusalem Theatre, December 25).

SINCE 1974, choirs coming from abroad on a Christmas pilgrimage to Bethlehem have been getting together in an evening at the Jerusalem Theatre arranged by the Tourism Ministry. This year five visiting and two Israeli choirs produced a mini-marathon, involving some 275 people, choristers and conductors, in an event with a most friendly atmosphere (and without the stress a competition entails) with the pleasant additions of emcee Danny Ziff.

The Spanish choir, directed by Emilio Reina, sang some old, very attractive songs beautifully, in a rich and sonorous presentation despite its small number (27).

The 55-strong youthful choir from Severs, conducted by Gilbert Villedieu, interpreted three settings by Francois Poulenc. They were fairly interesting in character, unlike the rather boring, sentimental Faure piece offered by this group of clear, if not too homogeneous, voices.

A mighty 40-voice choir from Texas, led by Bruce Chamberlain, offered two Hassler (16th century) pieces and two by contemporary American composers (Berger and Georg Schumann) and two Christmas carols. They were quite well-balanced, with strong dynamic contrasts and liveliness their contribution.

The very young singer Choroale de Notre Dame, directed by Lucie Fylo, ch interpreted several songs season and others and earn applause, with their cou from Severs giving the 35 c standing ovation.

Bonds shine as bank shares fade

There was little end-of-the-year cheer in the halls of the exchange on the last trading day of the calendar year yesterday. Most people will remember the major events. The one of the Rieger empire, which triggered the collapse at the outset of the year. The other is October 6, saw the end of the "bank stabilization" era and the fall of the bank share crisis, which led to the government guaranteeing those shares.

The share market continued to shrink as it was devalued by 0.6 per cent against the dollar.

The share market certainly was not helped any by the gloomy expectations surrounding the budget proposals for 1984, which will be announced today by Finance Minister Yigal Cohen-Orgad.

Oil shares, if the general atmosphere in the market had not been so gloomy, should have taken a big upward jump. In the course of the week one kept hearing about possible oil strikes at the Karmon 3 and Gurim 4 drill sites. But yesterday the index for oil shares fell by 0.54 per cent.

Industrial shares saw their sectoral index go down by more than one per cent. Elbit Computers, a recent good mover, continued to ease as it dropped 4.3 per cent, while Elron traded unchanged.

Tel Aviv Stock Exchange

By JOSEPH MORGENSTERN

The fertilizers 0.1 shares were 9.8 per cent lower. Pri-Ze fell by a full 10 per cent. Haifa Chemicals moved against the trend and picked up 5.4 per cent. Clal Electronics was down by 6 per cent. Rim 0.1 was 5.9 per cent lower, while the 5 shares were down 10.2 per cent.

Investment company issues were badly hit as prices reeled downward. While the control over the Israel Corporation continues to remain in doubt, the price of its shares continued to fall. The 1 shares fell by 6.8 per cent while the 5 shares were down by 8.6 per cent. Clal Israel, which seeks control over the Israel Corporation, saw its 10 shares fall by 7.9 per cent, while the 50 shares were 7.3 per cent lower.

Those who searched for gaining shares could find some encouragement in the insurance sector. Insurance issues were the only ones able to point to a gaining session.

The Tel Aviv Stock Exchange concluded the year's activities yesterday and will not reopen until Monday, January 2, 1984. The banks will be closed on Sunday to close their accounts for 1983. Starting next week, share trading will be done on the basis of specific areas of activity. Textile related issues, for instance, will be divided into fashion manufacturers which will trade in one group while weavers, spinners and dyers will trade in another.

The only choice

WHEN COUNTRIES go berserk, as Israel did under the stewardship of Menachem Begin, Ariel Sharon and Yoram Aridor, there is no guarantee that they can correct their course without grave convulsions. For in the hands of strong and popular leaders, even irrational policies gain the stamp of legitimacy and the accolades of a trusting public. And when the job of repair devolves upon a successor government, like that of Mr. Shamir, which cannot simply go to the public and candidly explain that the past was a mistake, the momentum of that past impedes repair. Yet such delay promises only to deepen the inevitable convulsion.

This process has already manifested itself regarding Israel's war in Lebanon. Its full force is now emerging regarding Israel's economic condition as well.

No thinking Israeli can today deny the necessity of reducing the level of national expenditure by the citizenry and by the government. However, all the many interest groups want the reductions to be effected everywhere but in their own sector. Thus the government confronts an internecine battle amongst its ministries and constituent coalition parties — each of which wants to protect its bastion and its flag.

Even if the government succeeds in forging a common policy, with sufficient teeth left in it to hold a promise of economic repair, it will then still have to confront the countervailing power of organized labour. That power too is only loosely disciplined, in the Histadrut, where the constituent interest groups also give priority to the protection of their own.

What the country faces, therefore, is not simply an economic crisis that can be given to economic manipulation, but a political and social crisis, namely a fundamental challenge to the cohesiveness of the nation. In this circumstance, Mr. Cohen-Orad can only supply a recipe for reform, he cannot hold the country, let alone the cabinet, together to implement it. Mr. Shamir's problem is no different. Even if he momentarily holds his ministers together, he still faces the challenge of binding the nation as a whole around a policy of self-sacrifice, dislocation and unemployment.

With his narrow parliamentary base, Mr. Shamir's prospects appear dim. Nor would the prospects be better if he were to be replaced by a new, though narrow, coalition headed by the Opposition Labour Party.

Only if the two major parties, Labour and Likud, join together in a common programme can there be any prospect for genuine economic reform based on national consent. That could occur before elections or after. The political needs of the nation, the need to free the nation from the grip of the directions, slogans and symbols settled upon it by the Likud, which have brought Israel to its present state, would dictate elections. But the dire economic needs, which require urgent action, militate against the delay and financial costs of elections.

The imperative of the hour, therefore, is national rescue jointly by the two major political parties. For the sake of the nation, Mr. Shamir should immediately take the initiative to put such a new government in place.

Shock for UNESCO

THE NEWS that the U.S. has served notice it will pull out of UNESCO within a year is of some direct interest to this country. One of the American complaints concerning intolerable politicization in this specialized United Nations agency has to do with the fact that it has been treating Israel like mud.

To be sure, Israel is not at the top of Washington's list of grievances. The U.S. bill of attainder is wide-ranging. In essence it states this: that whatever contribution UNESCO may have made in the past "by promoting collaboration among nations through education, science and culture," in recent years it has become an oversized and wasteful instrument of ideological domination run by an unholy alliance of Third World and Soviet bloc countries.

The most outstanding example of this trend has been UNESCO's proposed "new world information and communications order." Masked as an effort to free the developing nations from the monopoly of a handful of western news agencies, this "new order" has shaped up as the means whereby tyrannical governments could obstruct the free flow of information and keep their peoples in the dark.

Although in their final version the organization's "information guidelines" were amended under western pressure, the entire experiment has left a bitter aftertaste. Washington became convinced that, like the International Labour Organization before it, UNESCO could not be reformed from within, and that the only effective action was outright American withdrawal. This would deprive UNESCO of one quarter of its budget, and thus help concentrate its collective mind on the need to change its present anti-western, and especially anti-American, course.

For the moment, however, America is going it alone. No other western nation is planning to follow in its footsteps. Should Israel do so?

Israel cannot ignore its systematic abasement by UNESCO at the behest of the Arabs and the Soviets. The memory still rankles of this country's exclusion from any of its regional groups on the spurious grounds that, by excavating Jerusalem, it was altering the city's "historical features." Yet Israel's policy has been to insist on its right of membership in all international organizations, no matter how hard a life it may lead in them.

By withdrawing from UNESCO Israel would in fact be giving comfort to its enemies, who might welcome an opportunity to replace it with the PLO, now acting as an observer. Moreover, unlike the U.S., Israel could not be certain that it would be allowed to rejoin the organization at some future date.

Whatever the case, the issue of Israel's continued membership in UNESCO deserves to be authoritatively settled.

FINANCE MINISTER Yigal Cohen-Orad will probably discover today, when he presents the cabinet with the proposed budget for fiscal 1984, that the honeymoon is over.

Even before the cabinet meeting, some of his projected budget cut-back proposals, leaked to the media, triggered a hail of warning shots from Coalition ministers. One, for a year's freeze on new settlements in the territories, caused a political furor, and augured that today's budget debate would be stormy or that Cohen-Orad could choose to sidestep the more politically controversial issues.

Cohen-Orad will come to his fellow ministers at one of the worst possible moments in terms of persuading them to put his policies into practice. Not only is inflation running in the neighbourhood of 60 per cent for just the last three months, but there is also the unpleasant fact that wage earners and those who live on fixed allowances are finding it increasingly difficult to maintain themselves with the present effects of austerity.

The finance minister insists that his proposals are essential. Unless Israel reduces its balance of payments deficit by some $1 billion, the country may find itself unable to get any credit abroad. For this reason, wages must fall by 12 per cent, and the standard of living by some 8 per cent.

In the coming year, as the recession deepens, more than 30,000 workers will be added to the current 60,000 jobless. Government spending is to be reduced by some $1 billion, and subsidies for basic commodities will be drastically cut.

The problem with these plans is that they represent planning in purely technical economic terms. Socially and politically, Cohen-Orad's intentions are not only unrealistic, but they also more than suggest an immediate future of growing tensions and the breakdown of social and welfare systems that were built up over years.

When the cabinet begins to discuss the budget, the finance minister is not likely to get a pat on the back from either Deputy Prime Minister David Levy or from Labour Minister Aharon Uzan, who see their constituencies to be the urban blue collar workers and low-income groups.

Levy already has reason to create trouble for the government of Yitzhak Shamir. Disappointment over his unsuccessful bid to get the Foreign Ministry portfolio may be translated into an attack on that government's weakest flank, the economy. In addition, he may believe that someone with authority should speak up about alienating traditional Herut voters.

As for Tami, which effectively blocked most of Yoram Aridor's plans last August, a stand opposing the proposals of Cohen-Orad may be an asset come general elections. Tami's constituency has been hurt by Treasury policy, and to defend what the finance minister has in mind may prove to be an impossible mission.

Cohen-Orad is skating on thin ice, and not only politically. He is trying to make wage-earners pay the price of stabilizing the economy. A policy that results in wage erosion of 40 to 50 per cent in three months, when the finance minister openly encourages industrialists and banks, is justly regarded by broad sectors of the population as "unfair."

There is a basic economic flaw in Cohen-Orad's plans — disregard for inflationary developments. He admits that in his outlook for the coming months, inflation is of secondary importance. No one should be surprised if the pace of price increases will soon force him to take urgent, stop-gap measures.

No economy can function properly when the rate of price increases reaches 15 to 20 per cent per month. Such inflation is significant not only in terms of numbers, but beyond a certain point, it even assumes a character of its own.

The consensus among economic observers, both within and outside the government, is that inflation during 1984 will hover around the 300 per cent mark. There are economists who predict that prices will go up 400 per cent the coming year.

At such levels of inflation, demands for a complete revision of payments arrangements will be made. The cry will grow for calculation of price indexes two or four times a month, instead of once a month, and this will become a political question.

As inflation increases, the Treasury's revenue from taxes will probably decrease. This effect, found in almost every inflationary economy, has already begun to be felt in Israel, and there is a marked fear among State Revenue Administration officials that actual tax revenue will fall far short of forecasts.

If such a development comes to pass, the finance minister will have to return to the cabinet for further budget cuts — assuming he gets the cuts he is now asking for. By that time, both the economy and the government may be in such straits that a request for further cuts could lead to a cabinet crisis, or to a complete breakdown of economic policy. Cohen-Orad may find that he, like Yoram Aridor, will be made the scapegoat for the economic failure of the government.

COHEN-ORAD FACES another potential opponent to his policy, one from his own Herut faction. He has made it clear that the establishment will have to "share" of budget cuts.

Defence Minister Moshe Aron said what he thinks a plans, one has only to recall almost endless discussions in place between him and Aridor, to imagine what kind stakes the present finance n will face

While Cohen-Orad considers a major point of his program an improvement in the balance of payments, exports are often in reaction to changes in trends, and he may be optimistic in his goal to achieve a similar rise in exports. A influence here is the slow economic recovery in Europe.

Reducing imports will through reduced economic and at the expense of growth has to take into consideration output that will be lost economic slowdown. Israel experienced a recession-induced in imports in 1982 and 1983, causes the improvement balance of payments disarray with economic recovery. T no reason why this should n pen this time.

WORLD LAW

To the Editor of The Jerusalem Post Sir, — The two most dangerous myths in America today are that we can find security through more missiles, and that we can find security through eliminating missiles. Neither will prevent war. As part of any plan for lasting peace, we must strengthen the rule of world law by reforming the United Nations.

The UN needs a more accurate way of reflecting what the world truly wants, a better way of making up the world's mind, a simple accurate way of measuring what is politically and diplomatically possible, and thereby finding workable solutions to the disputes between nations which will always be with us.

The first step to a just UN is to give it a means to reach fair and acceptable decisions in dealing with threats to world peace.

Under a new system called the Binding Triad, developed by the Center for War/Peace Studies, important decisions of the General Assembly would still be adopted with a single vote but with three simultaneous majorities of those nations present and voting. The majority must include two-thirds of the members, nations representing two-thirds of the world's population, and nations representing two-thirds of the contributions to the UN budget. In this way, any resolution would have to be supported by most of the countries, most of the population, and most of the political, economic and military strength of the world.

Under this simple change, the 158 nations would have a reliable way to reach politically sound and fair decisions. No nation would have a veto, but no vote would reflect merely a majority of mini-states. Developing a way for the UN to make up its mind would be an important step toward world law, a world security system and meaningful disarmament.

PUTTING THE NATION FIRST

To the Editor of The Jerusalem Post Sir, — It seems that the stevedores in Ashdod and Haifa got all they asked for, caused havoc in the country's exports and millions of shekels of losses to the economy.

What is the use of cutting the budget and imposing new taxes trying to balance the budget if ultimately a strike or two wipes everything out in a short time?

In a few weeks the 30 per cent gain of the stevedores will be totally ineffective with accelerating inflation, and new demands will have to be made — by them or somebody else.

It is not the economic professors who are at fault but the general public. We still have to learn the simple truth of responsibility and pride in our work — of advancing the nation and not ourselves. Because only by putting the nation first can we better ourselves in every sense.

ALIYA ALIVE

To the Editor of The Jerusalem Post Sir, — I would like to refer to the letter by J. Jacobson, which appeared in The Jerusalem Post of December 14. If this reader was ever an oleh, I believe he has forgotten how he came to Israel — one does not arrive spontaneously, aliya sometimes takes many years to arrange and plan prior to actually arriving in Israel.

Jacobson writes "Virtually most of the Jews in the world who want to live in Israel already live here." There is no doubt as to the falseness of this statement.

Many middle aged Jews dream of the day that they will financially be able to make aliya. Summer and yearly programmes teach youth about Israel, Judaism and Zionism, which undoubtedly promotes aliya, perhaps when these youth finish their studies. But a great push to aliya are those parents who have some if not all of their children and grandchildren living in Israel, Jerusalem.
